It's time for a good book

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

With Chanukah coming so early this year, it's possible that we don't have to talk about curling up with a good book in front of a fire while the snow swirls outside.

Or maybe we do — there are definite indications that this will be an early, hard winter. There are also definite indications that this will be a late, mild winter.

Whatever it is, here is some excellent reading to take your mind off the sleet, ice and whatever else is coming.

The Lidek Revolution, by James Stark (Creative Bound, 1993), is a fascinating, disturbing Canadian novel that is thankfully free of the pretentiousness that marks so many of its genre.

A hand-held, totally accurate lie detector quickly becomes part of everyday life throughout the world. Its implications for politicians, religious functionaries, and interpersonal relationships may at first blush appear benign and even humorous, (it's nice to see politicians caught in their never-ending circle of lies and evasions) but quickly become tragic, terrifying or destructive.

Another worthwhile Canadian work of fiction is Everything in Winnipeg Begins in a Car by Martin Waxman (Black Moss Press, 1994).

This selection of short stories deal with the short, not very happy life of Winnipegger Paul Samuels. Another in the never-ending line of "Jewish angst" works, this one shows humor and insight.

The teachings and philosophies of the Chassidic master Rabbi Nachman of Breslov appear in a pocket-size (although hardcover) book The Empty Chair, published by Jewish Lights in 1994.

Each page has just one or two aphorisms, surprising relevant in today's world. They deal with faith, truth, people's relationship with G-d in simple, deceptively straightforward terms.

Some examples — When you feel yourself getting angry, stop. Imagine yourself as having already exploded and you now feel wasted. For that's what happens when you get angry: your soul leaves you. Do this and your anger is sure to dissolve...Better to be a fool who believes everything than a skeptic who believes nothing — not even the truth.

A similar book is a Shambhala Pocket Classic The Way of the Jewish Mystics, edited by Perle Besserman. It is full of parables and short teachings from such diverse thinkers as the Baal Shem Tov, Martin Buber, Isaac Luria and chassidic rebbes.

It seems surprising, if one begins to think about it, that there has not been more written about the Biblical story of Ruth by women, since, after all, the protaganists are women.

That is changed with the recent publication of Reading Ruth; comtemporary women reclaim a sacred story edited by Judith Kates and Gail Twersky Reimer (Ballantine Books, 1994).

Articles, poems, personal narratives and works of fiction by writers, poets, women rabbis, professors give unique perspectives on Ruth, from the religious, to the sociological, to the literary.

The success of Steven Spielberg's Raiders of the Lost Ark was a tribute not just to Spielberg and Harrison Ford but to the eternal fascination with archeology.

Charles Pellegrino has written a fascinating account of archeology and its relation to the Bible, Return to Sodom and Gomorrah; Bible stories from archaelogists (Random House, 1994).

Archeological examination of such topics as the story of Eve, the parting of the Red Sea, ancient civilizations of Babylon and Egypt, the Ark of the Covenant and the destroyed cities of Sodom are explained in clear and exciting prose.

Maps, diagrams and photographs are used very effectively.

In Jewish Renewal; a path to healing and transformation (Grosset/Putnam, 1994), author Michael Lerner charges that modern American Judaism is so enfused with the materialism of the society around it that many Jews have abandoned it as a source of comfort and spirituality.

In this decidedly liberal approach to Judaism, he discusses such topics as homophobia, feminism, and Zionism as they relate to Biblical sources.

Jewish music man appeals to kids of all ages

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto-born, internationally renowned Paul Zim, singer, entertainer and recording artist, known to many as the Jewish Music Man, has just released a fun-filled sing-along cassette and compact disc, Zimmy Zim's Zoo And Noah's Ark, Too, just in time for Chanukah gift buying. It features Zim, a children's chorus and a lively band.

Zim told The CJN, "My tape is great for the kids." It tells the story of Noah and introduces many animals, with the message that animals and people can get along together. Through action and play, kids participate.

He adds that the tape appeals to children of all ages and parents and teachers love it too.

The tape is in Hebrew and English. Zim's imaginative music combines Jewish liturgy and exciting original melodies, which serve to introduce young children to the concept of the Righteous Man, Noah, tell the story of the great flood and introduce family and zoo animals.

Songs like Monkey See, Monkey Do, lend themselves to ongoing participation.

Communication is another theme

The second side of Zimmy features the rainbow and its message of respecting all of G-d's creations. Communication is another theme and songs include G-d's Creatures and favorites such as Shalom Chaverim — till we meet again.

"Children will learn new Hebrew words while they are enjoying these lovely and very stimulating songs," says Zim.

The story format of each song and a lyric sheet help make this a creative learning tool.

Zim says that "a family that sings together has a truly fantastic time" and what better time is there to sing together than at Chanukah.

Zim also has a tape called Chanukah Miracle and he recently released a sing-along for moms and pops — and grandparents too, Sweet Singing Lullabies, which he has dedicated "to the new age of fatherhood."

During his career, Zim has released recordings of music from the Holocaust, Shabbat songs, Yiddish compilations, Passover, other Chanukah collections, chassidic and cantorial selections and even a Jewish disco album.

For preschoolers, The Kooky Cookie Kids — Sing-Along is a fun-filled tape with songs that include everything from Grandma and Grandpa to cookies and dolls.

Zimmy Zim's Zoo and other Paul Zim tapes and CDs are available at Judaica shops.

Ukrainian teen wows audience in first Hallelujah Festival

By JANICE DITCHEK
Special to The CJN

Diana Fuchsman, 17, from Vinnitsa, Ukraine, second place winner of the Hallelujah Israel Song Contest in Jerusalem. [JDC photo]

In any other setting, it might not have seemed so extraordinary. A petite, dark-haired 17-year-old stood onstage ready to perform in a Jewish musical contest.

She held a menorah of brightly glowing candles as she sang. Ten judges and an audience of 800 sat in awe as she mesmerized the crowd with her original composition about Jewish history, titled Haggadah (legend). When the song was over, the audience showered her with roses and enthusiastic applause.

At the end of the evening, the young woman was chosen from among the participating youth as the first place winner.

On the surface, there was nothing outstanding about this event beyond the display of talent that had been shared. A group of young people performed in competition, and some won prizes. Such events take place in numerous synagogues, Jewish community centres and performing halls throughout the United States and Canada.

But this one did not. This performance was held last June in Moscow, a city in which such an openly staged Jewish cultural event would have been illegal, if at all conceivable, just a few short years ago.

The finalist, Diana Fuchsman, a resident of Vinnitsa in the western Ukraine, had come to Moscow to participate in the first American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee-sponsored Hallelujah Festival held in the former Soviet Union.

The festival originated with a request last spring from the Israel Hallelujah Festival to identify a student representative to participate in Israel's international Hallelujah contest in July. The Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) responded by creating a local program designed to meet this request while also benefiting the greatest number of people at home.

A program was developed to Contest designed to strengthen Jewish identity among Soviets capitalize on the Soviet love of music. Patterned after the Israel festival, the contest served to strengthen Jewish identity by publicly connecting the Soviet Jewish community to its religious and cultural roots.

Thirteen competitors between the ages of 15 and 21 came from 12 different cities around the former Soviet Union including Kiev, Cherson, Kirvograd, Kishinev, Minsk, Riga, St. Petersburg and Moscow. Contest rules required that each song entry be an original composition, written by the youth about Judaism, and containing at least some Hebrew.

For the first time ever these youngsters had the opportunity to openly express their feelings about their Jewishness in their native tongue. At last, they, their families and neighbors were asked to participate publicly in a cultural event whose main goals were to affirm their sense of Jewish communal life, to share their pride in Israel and to celebrate Jewish song and culture.

For the hundreds of Jews in the audience, the Moscow Hallelujah Festival was truly a crowning event. Jewish song and dance had finally been moved out of darkened basements and onto the public stage in a downtown Moscow theatre. For Soviet Jews who had long lived in a society rich in cultural life yet devoid of religiosity, the merging of these two worlds was a powerful and emotional experience.

In conjunction with JDC and Israeli delegates, the judges worked together to select a student who would best represent Jewish culture in the former Soviet Union at the Hallelujah Festival finals in Israel. They chose Diana Fuchsman, winner of the Moscow festival.

Fuchsman placed second in the finals in Israel. She received the second place award both for the words and music to her song Haggadah and for her overall performance.

JDC's Music and Arts Centre, founded in 1991, has often been at the heart of programs that enrich Jewish communal life in the former Soviet Union. The past decades of forbidden religious affiliation had left the Jewish community without teachers and leaders. Cantor Vladimir Pliss, the Centre's director, is aware that the only way to bring people back into the Jewish world is to capture their hearts.

Accordingly, the community's passion for theatre, music and the arts is used as an entry point. As in the case of the Moscow Hallelujah Festival, the Centre follows JDC philosophy, creating programs that are sensitive to the local population and its specific needs.

The Moscow Hallelujah Festival will become an annual event of the Music and Arts Centre, providing a vehicle for hundreds of Jews to rekindle their connections to Judaism and to Israel.

Halifax composer uses bubbie for Sesame Street song

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

Sandy Greenberg's grandmother was the inspiration for a song that has catapulted the Halifax composer and songwriter into the national television limelight.

She kept thinking of the good times she had with her grandmother when she authored Going to Grandma's, which recently had its debut on the Canadian edition of Sesame Street.

The two-minute video, shot in Halifax, features Greenberg's voice and guitar, background musical accompaniment by members of Greenberg's Razzamatazz group, and pictures of Halifax grandmother Marianne Ferguson and her granddaughter Becky.

"Our musical group, Razzamatazz For Kids, was seen by a Montreal visitor in 1993," said Greenberg, born in Washington D.C., but a Halifax resident for the last 20 years.

"She suggested we submit our work to Sesame Street, but I was shy doing that and it took a while to get the courage. When I did, they asked for a further four-song demo tape and picked Going to Grandmas."

Greenberg was asked to make a few changes in the lyrics, "The song has a klezmer beat and the producers wanted something ethnic in the lyrics. They specifically asked for Jewish lyrics; so we changed some English words to Yiddish, like bubbie for grandma. There is a verse about lighting the Sabbath candles and they loved it."

The producers also asked Greenberg to find a grandmother and child for the video; a search of the Jewish community produced Marianne and Becky.

"Everyone I asked suggested them and they were perfect," said Greenberg. Additional ethnic content is a special cloth covering the challah served at Grandma's Sabbath dinner. It was made by Mrs. Ferguson's mother and has remained in the family."

Ferguson was excited to be in the video. "Many of my friends get tears in their eyes each time they watch the video because they see their own grandchildren in it," she said.

Greenberg and her husband, Tom Cormier, with Ronnie MacEachern as a regular fiddle accompanist, comprise Razzamatazz for Kids, which performs music for children. She and her group have just completed their first CD and cassette.

Greenberg, with partner Rose Vaughn, also operates Rosee and Sandy's Kids Entertainment Company, which does birthday, company and holiday parties, and face painting at community fairs.

Sandy Greenberg, Halifax composer, sings Going to Grandma's, to Halifax grandmother Marianne Ferguson and Lise Cormier, 8, and Dominic Cormier, 6, Greenberg's children. The song, in video form with Greenberg's voice, has appeared on Sesame Street. [Joel Jacobson photo]

JDC's history linked with Jewish refugees

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Few organizations are as inextricably bound up with the story of Jewish refugees during this century as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

The JDC was created in 1914 by a confluence of the American Jewish Relief Committee, the Orthodox Central Relief Committee and several American philanthropists. One year later, the People's Relief Committee stepped aboard.

JDC statistics give just a hint of its activities: $50,000 given in 1914 to save the Jews of Palestine from starvation; 110,000 Jews helped to leave Germany from 1933-1939; 224,000 meals supplied to DP camps in 1947; 440,000 Jews assisted in reaching Israel by the end of 1950; in 1989 over 2,400 meals a day provided to needy Romanian Jews; a yearly budget by 1993 of over $61 million.

The geography it covers is like a roll call of Jewish history — Israel, the Soviet bloc, Germany, Turkey, Ethiopia, the countries that used to be Yugoslavia.

The JDC has its roots at the beginning of World War I. The war's turmoil, and the redrawing of national boundaries, left many Jews uprooted and in dire poverty.

Until 1924, the JDC concentrated on relief programs and health and child care facilities in Poland and Russia, as well as supporting religious, cultural and educational institutions.

In the Soviet Union, until it was forced to leave in 1938, the JDC (as it prefers to be called now, although many still know it affectionately as "the Joint") tried to establish agricultural settlements for Jews in Ukraine and the Crimea.

Ironically, some of its best-known activities in the last 20 years have been once more in the Soviet Union and the CIS, including soup kitchens, educational institutions, camps and the rebuilding of synagogues.

The story of the JDC during World War II reads like a spy thriller.

Negotiations with Eichmann

Together with representatives of different other agencies, such as the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society and the Jewish Agency, the JDC negotiated with Adolph Eichmann to exchange Jews for large sums of money, the so-called "Jews for Bread" exchange. Thousands of Jews were rescued or, at least, saved from death in Poland, Hungary, France, Turkey.

In the best secret agent fashion, representatives of the JDC parachuted behind enemy lines to offer assistance and to collect information which they passed on to Allied countries. Most of it, it appears, was either disbelieved, or, more often, disregarded.

After the war, the JDC helped displaced Jews in DP camps and in those far-flung locales where Jews had found refuge, such as Shanghai. Many remember their first clothes, or milk for their children, coming from "the Joint."

The secret agent work did not end with the war. JDC representatives smuggled Jews into Mandate Palestine with Mossad and Bricha workers. This was done without the approval of the JDC board members, many of whom did not support the idea of a Zionist state.

With the establishment of Israel, JDC resumed its relief efforts, working with the handicapped and the elderly and resettlling immigrants.

It also turned its attention to those Jews remaining in North Africa and the Middle East. It provided food and assistance to Gondor province in Ethiopia, and helped with the airlifts from Yemen, Operation Moses and Operation Solomon, which secretly brought Ethiopian Jews to Israel.

Recently, the JDC has turned its attention to the trouble spots of Bosnia and Rwanda. It is here that Canadians have helped play a role.

Daniel Fine, director of political liason and international affairs for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, told The CJN his organization, together with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, has organized three non-sectarian airlifts of pharmaceuticals and winter clothing to the former Yugoslavia.

The region and the Toronto Federation also organized the Rwandan Relief Fund, which raised money to help victims of the Rwandan civil war.

Recipe variations are tasty

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Latkes, latkes everywhere...

If you're like me you've always celebrated Chanukah with a hearty dose of anything and everything that's fried. Everyone else thinks that this is the Festival of Lights. I call it the Carnival of Clogged Arteries.

My metabolism, that part of my body that laughs hysterically every time I get onto a scale, thinks my zaftig figure has had enough doughnuts. It stores every gram of fat that makes it's way to my stomach.

So, after years of fighting the battle of the bulge, I've come to terms with the fact that the eight days of eating all the latkes smothered in apple sauce and sour cream that I want are gone forever. (I never really had days like that, I just like to pretend.)

Ok, for tradition's sake, I guess a few latkes and other Chanukah stuff won't be too bad for me. I just have to get rid of some of the calories.

The compromise that I've come up with is to put my favorite recipes on a diet and come up with some "new" recipes that use different ingredients and have a lower fat content. I refuse to sacrifice taste for my waist so I had to get creative.

I have to tell you that I surprised myself. These dishes are really good. Ok, so it's not exactly the same as chowing down on half a dozen cookies covered in frosting or stuffing myself with chocolate coins but it sure is close.

RICOTTA LATKES

15 to 16 oz kosher part skim ricotta or drained low fat cottage cheese
4 large eggs
6 Tbsp. flour
2 Tbsp. margarine, melted
1 to 2 Tbsp. sugar
2 tsp. vanilla

Put all the batter ingredients in a food processor (steel blade) or blender. Process in batches if necessary. Process until the batter is smooth, like a thick cream. (This batter will be thinner than most pancake batters.) Spray griddle with cooking spray (you can add a little margarine or butter if you want). Heat griddle to medium heat. Spoon 1½ to 2 Tbsp. of the batter onto the griddle. When a few bubbles start to appear and the bottom of the latke is golden turn over (the latke will not rise). Cook briefly on the second side and serve with jam, applesauce, vanilla yogurt or a cinnamon sugar mixture. Makes 20 to 25 3-inch pancakes.

RICE-CHEESE LATKES

2 cups cooked white or brown rice
3 oz. shredded kosher cheese, cheddar, mozzarella, etc.
3 large eggs, separated
3 Tbsp. flour
pinch of salt
pinch of black pepper
1/8 tsp. kosher cream of tartar
4 to 6 Tbsp. kosher margarine or oil for frying

In a medium bowl, mix together the rice, cheese, egg yolks, flour, salt and pepper. In another bowl, beat the egg whites with the cream of tartar until they are stiff but not dry. Fold the beaten whites into the rice cheese mixture until combined. In a large skillet heat about 2 tbsp. of oil. Spoon 2 to 3 tbsp. of the batter onto the skillet for each latke and flatten it slightly with the back of the spoon. Fry the latkes, turning once until they are golden brown on both sides. Repeat with the remaining batter, adding oil to the skillet as needed. Serve hot. Makes 15 to 18 small latkes.

A Theology Of Social Action

by Rabbi Dow Marmur

One of the fundamental changes that is taking place in Jewish life is that Jewish law, halachah, has become inoperative for most Jews. Thus, according to their own self-definition, only 10 percent of American Jews describe themselves as Orthodox. And it is only Orthodox Jews who still claim that Jewish law is operative in their lives. The figures in Israel are not much higher for Orthodox allegiance and, of course, the State of Israel is not run according to Jewish law.

Halachah has power over few Jews nowadays. Many more – for example Conservative Jews in the United States and Reform Jews in Britain – pay lip service to it. They use it selectively and whimsically in a way Canadian sociologist of religion Reginald Bibby has described as religion à la carte.

Had halachah been operative today, the terms of reference for Social Action in contemporary Judaism would have been clear. For Jewish law governs all aspects of Jewish life, not only that which is often described as beyn adam lamakom, "between humanity and God," but also beyn adam lechavero, "between one human being and another." There are, therefore, definite laws in traditional Judaism about how we should treat each other, individually and collectively. But once that law ceased to be binding, we lost the basis and have been left with no clear formula for action.

Yet we still have the need. Judaism can never be abstract theory. It must always be practical action.

Judaism is a Religion of Practical Action

Therefore, though halachah may no longer be an acceptable norm for most Jews, mitzvah is. Mitzvah, "commandment," implies an action commanded by God. And God is affirmed by many more Jews than is Jewish law. Though only 10 percent of all Jews describe themselves as Orthodox, many more believe in God. Hence the need to do something to express this faith, even if Jews are irritated by the demands of the legalistic framework of Judaism. They want not only to be Jews but also to do Jewish things, although they are not prepared to view such actions as legally binding. Even Orthodox thinker Rabbi Irving Greenberg alludes to this when he speaks of a "voluntary covenant" after the Shoah.

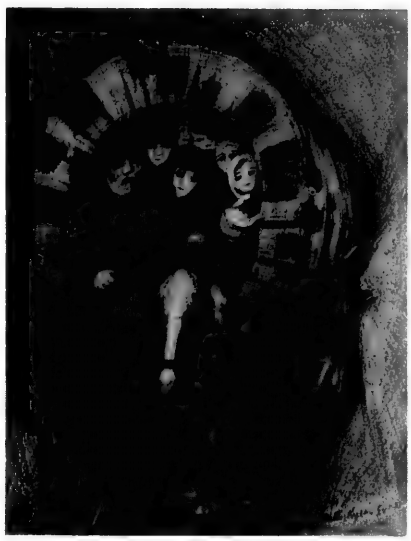
Distinction Between Halachah and Mitzvah

The distinction between halachah and mitzvah is important for another reason: it enables non-Orthodox Jews to affirm revelation without falling into the trap of legalism. By seeking to express God's commandment, mitzvah, we can be true to our tradition and yet free of the constraints of a system of law, halachah, and thus have a basis for non-Orthodox observance.

For a long time, Jews found it difficult to do "Jewish things" in the realm of beyn adam lamakom, "between humanity and God," because that implied ritual. In fact, a major reason Reform Judaism developed was in answer to the need of many Jews to shed those rituals that separated them from the rest of the population. Such rituals were often described as "ceremonial" and not infrequently linked with hypocrisy and mindlessness. By contrast, actions to be performed beyn adam lechavero, "between people," were deemed authentic, primary and sincere: they were ethical.

There arose thus a sharpened division between the ritual/ceremonial and ethics, often expressed as Social Action. And ethics was considered superior to ritual. Did not the Hebrew prophets, the supreme exponents of ethics, castigate the priests, the practitioners of ritual? Did not, in later times, the Pharisees, the heirs of the biblical prophetic tradition, stand against the Sadducees, the conservative exponents of the priestly party? Should not we Jews emulate the prophets and the Pharisees?

There was, of course, a more tangible reason why Reform Jews wanted to concentrate on ethics and ignore ritual. In the same way as ritual separated Jews from gentiles, ethics would bind Jew to gentile. Whereas emphasis on ritual belonged to the world of the ghetto, where Jews lived apart, the stress on ethics belonged to the age of emancipation, when Jews sought integration in society. And Reform Judaism was the expression of integrationist, emancipated Judaism. By minimizing ritual and maximizing ethics, Reform could present Judaism as a worthy partner in influencing, perhaps even shaping, the new society. Reform congregations were proud when their rabbi appeared beside the archbishop and the cardinal on behalf of homeless mothers or against the exploitation of children, advocating food for the hungry or opposing oppression in some far-away land. This stressed ethics and integration. Social Action became the tangible expression of Reform Judaism, particularly in North America.



"UNTITLED" BY NATHAN KAPLAN, MONTREAL

Orthodoxy Feared Interfaith Social Action Would Speed Assimilation

It also came to distinguish Reform from Orthodox and, to a large extent, Conservative Judaism. Internally, the differences were noticeable in how Reform Jews prayed or ate or celebrated, but the outside world was only dimly aware of those differences. Externally the differences were reflected in the Reform involvement in Social Action and the absence of others in this work. Although halachah provides for Social Action, and Orthodox Jews as adherents of halachah are commanded to practise it, another element entered into Orthodoxy. It was always there but it was more prominent when juxtaposed with the spirit of emancipation: the making of boundaries. In contrast to Reform, Orthodoxy feared the outside world and wished to separate itself from it, because it stressed the danger of assimilation. Therefore, it kept away from undue involvement with the non-Jewish world. Ethical conduct and Social Action were stressed as long as they were carried out from Jew to Jew – not from Jew to gentile. That is why Orthodox communities remain strong in their support for one another, but largely indifferent to the outside world.

In many ways, modern anti-Semitism has vindicated this approach and many Jews, who would describe themselves as secular, have taken it up. They see themselves as ethical persons with a deep social conscience, but they are not prepared to waste it on potentially hostile gentiles. Working in the Jewish community and for Israel are the primary manifestations of mitzvah among the secularists.

Many of them are likely to be members of Reform congregations for a host of irrelevant reasons. Civil religion is a primary force in contemporary Jewish life. With many other Jews, members of Reform congregations have become not only economically affluent, but philosophically bourgeois and middle-class in every sense. We know the middle classes love philanthropy, which they identify as ethical conduct, but are suspicious of Social Action because it smacks of leftist politics. They also suspect Social Action because it is collectivist, whereas individualism is central to the way of life of most of our members. They want their help to go to specifically designated individuals and groups, not anonymously to the common good. Hence the need for plaques, people honoured at events and all the other artificial structures that pander to bourgeois individualism and dominate Jewish life in the United States and elsewhere.

A Theology of Social Action

Now we can understand why the impulse to Social Action, once so prominent in Reform Judaism, has weakened in recent decades. We have many secular

EDITOR'S NOTEBOOK

Rabbi Dow Marmur has written what is in my view a most wide-ranging and scholarly assessment of the scope of Social Action for universal as well as Jewish causes and the importance of such activity for synagogues in today's world. He takes the position that there is a theology of Social Action which makes it inherently a religious activity, despite the fact that it is viewed by many, if not most members of the Jewish community, as a purely secular activity. Since Halachah he maintains, is no longer operative for most Jews, Social Action is taking its place as Mitzvah, even if no longer as "Commandment".

In the "Continuity Debate" Uri Rosenzweig, a long time community worker in Western Canada, puts his finger on what he perceives to be undue emphasis by community leadership on the diminishing quantity of Jewish practice in Canada, and overlooks the importance of the quality of Jewish life now being practiced. Creating more institutions and building more buildings without undertaking a thoroughgoing analysis of exactly what we are teaching our children on why to be Jewish rather than how to be Jewish will not stop the relentless drift toward intermarriage and assimilation.

Next we present a scholarly essay by Dr. Nelson Daniels on the history of proselytism by Jews, giving us a view of this question that is largely unknown to most of us. He ends with a plea that our community should become more involved in this activity, as a possible response to the diminishing number of Jews in the world.

Dr. Stephen Stern has sent us a warning of what he perceives as the dangers of unrestricted immigration. He explains why he feels that immigration today comes from many areas of the world, not only from Europe, and therefore brings in its train increased multiculturalism. He says: "unrestricted multiculturalism is a double-edged sword and should not be viewed with innocence."

Professor Stuart Schoenfeld has recently returned from Israel where he witnessed two seemingly minor incidents which his trained eye as a sociologist, beamed a light into the fog of uncertainty surrounding the doubtful new alignments within Israel, and between Israel and the surrounding Arab states where peace happily is beginning to break "out all over".

Shel Krakofsky and Kenneth Sherman have decided to present two poems in memory of Adele Wiseman, in cherished memory of her contribution to Jewish and Yiddish culture in Canada.

SOCIAL ACTION

Jews in our midst, and we are mostly middle-class. The former makes for isolationism and the latter for disdain for the masses. The combination puts brakes on Social Action and intensifies our work for Israel, which simultaneously meets the needs for philanthropy and isolationism. That is why we must try harder. Instead of being overwhelmed by isolationism in our midst, we must seek to counteract it. To do so, we not only need enthusiasm and tenacity, but a theoretical basis, a theology of Social Action.

As it cannot be Jewish law, what could it be? What are the theoretical foundations of Social Action in contemporary Reform Judaism? Let me offer only two arguments. The one I shall call historic and the other mystical, for I believe both are competing to fill the vacuum created by the end of legalism in Jewish life.

The historic reason for Social Action is best expressed in the many statements in Scripture about how to behave well to the downtrodden, whoever and wherever they may be – because we were slaves in Egypt. Whereas psychology may suggest that the downtrodden oppress others when they get a chance to do so, our theology insists that, because we have suffered, we must ease the suffering of others when we are given the means. Such action cannot be a matter of discretion. It is a question of duty. It is not charity but justice. Jewish power, to be authentic, must be exercised with the memory of powerlessness, because our memory as Jews is the key to our morality as Jews.

This, then, is the first reason why we must be in the forefront of Social Action: we have been on the other side, so we know what it is like. Now that we have "arrived," we are duty-bound to help others. In this scheme of things, as members of the middle class we have assumed additional responsibilities to be open to the world, not to have found more reasons for shutting it out.

The second reason for Social Action in this post-halachic age is mystical. In the Jewish mystical tradition much is made of the idea that the world is incomplete and our task as human beings is to complete it. This complex and difficult notion is often described as tikkun olam, "mending the world." Whatever it may mean theologically and philosophically, it offers a helpful metaphor for Social Action. We are doing things, performing mitzvot, as a way of helping to make the world a better place, of mending it. We have been created by God for this task. God has revealed the divine will to humanity through the people of Israel to tell us how to do it. When we are doing what our Creator revealed to us, we are working towards the redemption of the world.

Creation, revelation and redemption are the three categories of Jewish theology. Social Action is their practical manifestation and thus our contribution to the redemption of the as-yet-unredeemed, but divinely created, world. As in mysticism, each mitzvah has a practical and psychological value and assumes cosmic significance. And although it is not for any of us to eradicate all evil in the world, each of us, as the late Abraham Joshua Heschel has urged us, can remove some evils. And if enough of us help to remove evils, evil will disappear and the world will be mended.

Here the historical and the mystical dimensions converge, since the purpose of history is also redemption – freedom for our people – which is only possible when freedom has been achieved by all peoples. The promise given to our ancestors can, ultimately, only be fulfilled when the world has been perfected. The two reasons for Social Action are not alternatives but complementary.

Even this brief and inadequate excursion into mysticism offers a spiritually compelling reason for Social Action, although the historical argument may be more easily accessible and less complicated and abstract. It removes, of course, all considerations of expediency and, almost by definition, does not require any external reward. S'char mitzvah – mitzvah, our sages taught, the reward of a mitzvah is doing the mitzvah. It can be performed whether you believe it to be legally binding or "merely" morally compelling; whether you are a mystic or just someone who wants to be helpful. Once you accept its presupposition, all other reasons become unnecessary. It is also irrelevant to ask questions about who the recipient is – Jew or gentile, someone congenial or not – because the act makes the world a better place, even if it does not make the doer feel better. It is not even relevant to ask if your single action is going to solve the problem. If it alleviates it, however slightly, you are justified in doing it, because helping to bring the world towards redemption is always of value. It is, ultimately, a qualitative and not a quantitative act.

Social Action a Unifying Force For Jews

Social Action can become the unifying force in the Jewish world today. Those who hold different theological views, and those who reject theology altogether, can join forces in acts of love and giving affirming the human as being of infinite value, equality and uniqueness. Even if we are not in a position to explain or eradicate evil, we probably can remove some evils and thus help to "mend the world."

Perhaps the leaders of Canadian Jewry, who so audibly lament the alienation of some of our best people, would improve things by resolute action. This would show that we are concerned for society and can unite to further its welfare, not only in the face of anti-Semitism and in response to the danger to the State of Israel, but also on intrinsic merits. An intensified social-action programme would have wide and beneficial ramifications, besides being a real test of our emancipation. It is part of the programme for Jewish continuity.

The call to Social Action does not go against our commitment to our own community and the State of Israel. On the contrary, fighting evils does not preclude the evils that befall our own people, and championing the cause of justice always includes justice for Jews. To make a strong case, we must begin with ourselves and aim at making the Jewish community a model and an example, not a martyr. As Rabbi Irving Greenberg puts it, "after Auschwitz, martyrdom is morally offensive. The command is to live and to testify... how to use the power is the new halacha, but denial or endangering the power is considered the unforgivable sin."

The fact that we have left the ghetto does not absolve us from responsibility to fellow Jews, but it extends our obligations far beyond our own circles As Martin Buber put it: "To begin with oneself, but not to end with oneself; to start from oneself, but not to aim at oneself; to comprehend oneself, but not to be preoccupied with oneself."

The (Continuing) Continuity Debate

by Uri Rosenzweig

Some time ago, the great Jewish philosopher and historian, Simon Rawidowicz, suggested that we are "the ever-dying people," noting that throughout our history every Jewish generation feared it was the last link in the chain of the Jewish people. I have no doubt that 2000 years from now, if there are only two Jews left on this earth of ours, (God forbid) the debate about Jewish continuity will continue.

I'm neither a statistician nor a social scientist, but I am deeply troubled by the article by Professor Jim Torczyner and Shari Brotman in the August 1994 issue of Viewpoints, "Jewish Continuity in Canada." It seems that in both their detailed analysis of the 1991 Canadian Census and their findings compared to 1981, "the Jewish community in Canada is larger, stronger and has more children," they equate Jewish quantity with the quality of Jewish life. Furthermore, they note that "rapidly developing communities have fewer institutional resources" to cope effectively with such growth and they imply that somehow this accounts for the high rate of intermarriage. They cite Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton as such communities and I will demonstrate further on that their conclusion about Edmonton (which I'm most familiar with) is fallacious.

Jewish Continuity Not Only About Numbers

We must be clear that when we discuss "Jewish Continuity" we are not merely talking about numbers, which are important, but about the quality of Jewish life. As long as the planet Earth exists then some of its inhabitants will undoubtedly be Jewish – by religion or ethnicity – to use the Census study definition. It's even been suggested that should other planets be colonized or found to contain some form of human life, there will be Jews asking other Jews whether they had put on t'fillin that morning or for a UJA contribution. As Dennis Prager wrote about a decade ago, "The purpose of Jewish life is not that Jews survive, but that they lead Jewish lives, be a light unto the nations and repair the world under God's rule."

Similarly, the Toronto Task Force Report on Jewish Continuity noted; "Jewish continuity is not simply about whether our grandchildren will be Jewish or whether existing organizations will be able to continue paying their bills and delivering their services. The question is whether being Jewish will continue to be important to Jews; or whether it will become a peripheral and ultimately meaningless part of their lives."

There is nothing in the Torczyner-Brotman statistics to demonstrate the number of Jews, by ethnicity, religion or both, who consider being Jewish important. Indeed, one can claim to be Jewish by religion and not even belong to a congregation or attend services.

With regard to rapidly developing communities and high rates of intermarriage, Torczyner\Brotman state: "Rapidly developing communities have fewer institutional resources. Existing resources become strained in attempting to identify new members and respond to their needs. Often persons who move to cities with small Jewish populations and few institutional resources do not prioritize their communal affiliation. At best there is a considerable time lag before rapidly expanding communities can establish a more elaborate institutional framework. Thus, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton have very high rates of intermarriage and have experienced rapid growth within a relatively short historical period."

Edmonton Institutional Resources

So let's look at Edmonton's institutional resources. There are three congregations, two synagogues with the third housed in the Jewish community Centre, a Talmud Torah Day School, a new day school that opened a year ago, a Senior Citizens Drop-In Centre in its own building, a Jewish Community Centre, a Funeral Chapel, Chabad House, a Kollel, Camp B'nai Brith that serves both Calgary and Edmonton, a Jewish Family Services agency, UJA and a Federation. In addition to all these institutions, agencies and their numerous activities, nearly every Jewish national organization has its local counterpart. If this is not an elaborate enough "institutional framework" for a community of about 6000, I don't know what is. Yet, Edmonton has one of the highest rates of intermarriage in Canada, second only to Vancouver. How Torczyner-Brotman can reconcile their conclusions with these facts is beyond me, because most of these institutions and groups have existed for 10 years and longer and Edmonton's intermarriage rates have always been among the highest.

Prerequisites in the Continuity Battle

In my view there are a number of prerequisites that all communities must examine and adopt to prepare themselves for winning the continuity battle. The first is that just like the business world we must engage ourselves increasingly in research and development projects. Second, instead of merely pouring increased community funds into providing more of the same programs and services, we must develop innovative approaches and fashion new instruments of survival based on our research. Third, we must give the concept of Klal Yisrael real meaning so that it becomes a key component of Jewish communal life at the local level.

The Need For Research and Development

Certainly the phenomenon that exists in Edmonton, (as it may elsewhere) the abundance of Jewish institutional and organizational life as compared to the high rate of intermarriage and assimilation, suggests the need for more intensive research than merely comparing Census figures. Unfortunately the Edmonton Federation's involvement in social planning has been negligible. Certainly, ours is a community that could use the talents and expertise of Torczyner and Brotman because there are a lot more questions than answers regarding the future of this community. For example, formal Jewish education is considered the greatest bulwark against intermarriage and assimilation. The Edmonton Talmud Torah Elementary Day School was started in 1912, among the first in Canada. It has had the advantage of financial support by both the government and now by the Edmonton Public School board for its secular education. It's estimated that some 85% of eligible children attend the school. It is now embarked on a campaign to build a new school to extend to the Jr. High level. In addition, there is a new ultra-orthodox day school that opened last year. So why is assimilation and intermarriage so high?

Similarly, on a national scale there have been missed opportunities for meaningful research. One such example has been the March of the Living. I know of no teen who was not impressed and moved by their participation in this unique experience based on their written recollections. How meaningful it would have been had we placed their recordings in a time capsule and revisited these participants as young adults or adults to assess the continuing impact of those experiences.

Need for Innovative Programs

It is only on the basis of extensive research that we should embark on new innovative programs. I won't discuss this at length except to note one area where I believe the organized Jewish community has been negligent. We are rapidly moving into the electronic age with information highways and networking in various forms. Electronic media, which may seem too impersonal by some, will eventually become the most important communications vehicle in our society. If the Jewish community ignores this form of communication it shall have increasing difficulty in reaching out to its various publics with the message of Jewish continuity.

As Rabbi Abraham Heschel once noted, "The modern Jew is a messenger who forgets his message." That message must respond to the simple question, "Why be Jewish?" Our schools and rabbis and teachers show us how to be Jewish, but not why? We must develop an effective response to why to convince those drifting toward intermarriage and

by Dr. Nelson Daniels

The rapidly rising Moslem population of North America now equals the number of Jews, and aggressive proselytising has made Islam the fastest growing religion in North America. Jewish assimilation and low birth rate will only worsen this reality, and soon U.S. congressmen and Canadian M.P.'s will be courting the Moslem vote and ignoring the dwindling Jewish vote. There will be much less reason for North American politicians to support Jewish causes or maintain a close friendship with Israel – but if we numbered 10 or 15 million, instead of our present 5.5 million, politicians would go out of their way to avoid alienating the Jewish vote.

There are two solutions to this demographic time bomb: more Jewish babies or an influx of serious converts. Since only the very Orthodox are making more Jewish babies, proselytising, as practised for centuries by our ancestors, is the route to go. The pagan world of Greeks, Romans, and pre-Islamic Arabs was surprisingly tolerant of this Jewish activism, as long as due homage was paid to the ruling Emperor, King, Sheikh, Chief, etc. It was only with the recent supremacy of Christianity (in 320 CE) and Islam (in 670 CE) that Jewish proselytising ceased, because these frequently intolerant religions decreed severe punishment, even death, for the Jewish missionary and the convert. For nearly fifteen hundred years Jews have lived in Christian and Muslim societies who often made conversion to Judaism a capital offence – both for the convert and for the Jews involved in the conversion. It was only for this reason that Jews adopted their policy of discouraging conversion. Judaism desires converts, and when Jews were free to do so they actively encouraged would-be converts.

Missionary Role Natural to Devout Jews

That there were active Jewish religious missionaries twenty-two centuries ago might come as a surprise to those who have thought of missionaries as being exclusively Christian. The missionary role came naturally to devout Jews, especially during Hellenistic times, when Jewish life was convulsed by Messianic expectation. Jews believed they had a special part to play in the imminent redemption of all mankind. They had the absolute conviction, drawn from the Bible, that God had specifically chosen them to serve as "a light for the nations" in order to unite all people around the Torah. This mission was even given by several Rabbinical teachers as justification for the destruction of the Temple and the Dispersion in 70 C.E. of the Jewish people by the Romans. In the Talmud, Rabbi Eleazar ben Pedat went so far as to claim that the exile of the Jews from Israel, the most destructive event in ancient Jewish history, had one constructive purpose: "The Holy One, praised by He, exiled Israel among the nations for the purpose of gaining converts" (Pesachim 87B). In fact, of several dozen statements in the Talmud concerning converts and seeking converts, all but four are highly positive. The Avot de Rabbi Nathan, an early rabbinical work, encouraged Jews to emulate Abraham, who alone with his wife Sarah, spread the monotheist ideal: "Every Jew should endeavour to actively bring men under the wing of God's presence even as Abraham did." The model of Abraham was used not only to encourage Jews to seek converts, but also to encourage potential Gentile converts: "If a man wishes to convert to Judaism, but says, 'I am too old to convert.' let him learn from Abraham, who, when he was ninety-nine years old, entered God's covenant" (Tanhuma B, Lekh Lekha 40). Some rabbis went so far as to proclaim that converts were the greatest of Jews: "Said Resh Lakish: the convert is dearer than the Jews who stood before Mount Sinai. Why? Because had the Jews not seen the thunder and lightning and the mountains quaking and the sounds of the horn, they would not have accepted the Torah. But the convert, who saw none of these things, came, surrendered, and accepted on himself the kingdom of heaven. Could any be dearer than he?" (Tanhuma B, Lekh Lekha 6).

In espousing these beliefs about Jews seeking converts, the rabbis were faithfully reflecting the Hebrew Bible's attitude. The prophet Isaiah dreamed of the day when all the nations of the world would declare: "Come, let us go up to the Mount of the Lord, to the House of the God of Jacob: that he may instruct us in His ways and that we may walk in His path. For out of Zion shall go the Torah, and the word of God from Jerusalem" (Isaiah 2:3).

Judaism bestowed its highest honour upon a convert. Jewish belief holds that the Messiah will be a descendant of Ruth (ancestress of King David), a woman who converted to Judaism and for whom a book of the Bible was named.

Judaism's Wish to Seek Converts Recorded in Many Sources

That Jews attempted to implement Judaism's wish to seek converts is recorded in non-Jewish and Jewish sources. The New Testament states that in the Roman Empire the Jews would "sail the sea and cross whole counties to win one convert" (Matthew 23:15). Judaism had become so popular among segments of the Roman intelligentsia that Juvenal, the great Roman writer, wrote a satire about Roman fathers who eat no pork, observe the Sabbath, worship only the heavenly God, and whose sons undergo circumcision, despise Roman laws, and study the Jew's Torah. The Jewish historian Josephus wrote in the first century: "The masses have long since shown a keen desire to adopt our religious observances; and there is not one city, Greek or barbarian, nor a single nation, to which our customs of abstaining from work on the seventh day has not spread, and the fasts of lighting of (Sabbath) lamps and many of our prohibitions in the matter of food are not observed" (Contra Apion 2:39).

A vigorous movement for the Jewish religion was carried out in the Greco-Roman world by numerous unprofessional evangelists. These were dedicated zealots, both men and women. They roamed through all the Mediterranean countries, preaching, teaching, and proselytising everywhere – in Rome, Greece, Syria, Antioch, Asia Minor, North Africa, Carthage, Cyrenaica, and in other places where substantial Jewish colonies had already long been established.

"UNTITLED" BY NATHAN KAPLAN, MONTREAL

In Rome as everywhere the Jewish missionaries not only won over full proselytes, but they also attracted many thousands of semiproselytes or sympathisers of the Jewish religion, who were called Metuens – "devout persons." Although the Metuens observed the Sabbath as a day of rest, attended the synagogue, and listened to the expositions there on the principles of the Torah by the rabbis, yet they were not quite ready to go all the way and become converts. Their Judaism was one of degree. An effective discouragement to full conversion was the Rabbinical insistence that every male proselyte had first to submit to the rite of circumcision, a most painful ordeal for adults before anaesthesia. This explains why so many more women than men became full proselytes.

The numerous Jewish settlements in the Diaspora served as bases of operation for the Jewish missionary movement, which brought large increases in the Jewish population in every land. As evidence, we have the testimony of the Roman geographer Strabo (c. 63 C.B.E. - 24 C.E.): "It is not easy to find any place in the habitable world that has not yet received this nation and in which it has not made its power felt."

But the "power" of which Strabo spoke lay principally in the domain of the Jewish religious beliefs and ethical practices. The Greco-Roman slave system was fast disintegrating because of its social evils, cruelties, and economic senselessness. Everywhere, the average thoughtful Roman beheld widespread public corruption and inequities, the ready use of violence, and the resort to plunder and war which were all part of the state policy of their rulers. The "superior" civilizations first of the Greeks and then the Romans, each of whom considered themselves the "master race," had become rotten with cynicism and immorality. Many Romans, those of the nobility included, were attracted by the egalitarian, gentle, humane features of the Jewish religion and community life. Slaves, especially, were susceptible to the Jewish missionary appeal because they were readily accepted as proselytes and were well treated by the Jews.

The unknown Egyptian Jewish women evangelist of the third century B.C.E. who comprised the Third Sibylline Oracle, expresses the universal goal of all Jewish missionaries in Hellenistic times when she announced: "The children of Israel shall mark out the path of life to all mortals, for they are the interpreters of God, exalted by Him and bearing a great joy to all mankind!" The mission of Israel to the Gentiles in Greco-Roman times was aided by extensive Jewish literature written in Greek and employing Greek ideas and the familiar Greek terminology and literary allusions. Most influential among these writings in gaining converts were The Wisdom of Solomon, the Book of Ecclesiasticus by Jesus ben Sirach, the Fourth book of Maccabees, the Sibylline Oracles, and the writings of the philosopher – rabbi of Alexandria, Philo, and the Jewish historian Josephus. Pursuing their missionary ends, these writers extolled the principles and practices of Judaism. Conversely, they tried to lay bare what they regarded to be the fallacies and the moral limitations of the Greco-Roman religion, which, charged Philo, were full of lies and inventions. For that reason, he noted, many Gentiles "became sincere worshippers of the truth and gave themselves up to the practice of the purest piety."

Ascendancy of Christian Church Made Conversion a Capital Offense

The Jewish missionary movement, so successful for several centuries in winning converts, both full proselytes and "sympathizers," continued until Christian missionaries entered the field as competitors. With the ascendancy of the Church and the establishment of Christianity as the state religion by Dr. N. Daniels is a family physician practising in Toronto.

Emperor Constantine (in the fourth century CE), the situation was altered radically. Conversion to Judaism became a crime, soon a capital one, for both the convert and the Jews involved in the conversion. The Jews were driven out of the missionary field entirely in the territories of the Roman Empire and shifted their proselytizing to other regions. In Arabia, for example, they made numerous converts. When Mohammed came upon the religious scene in the seventh century, he found in that region a number of powerful tribes who had been converted to the Jewish religion centuries before by the already Jews of Yemen. And during the eighth century, another great missionary triumph was scored by the Jews in the vast Khazar kingdom (in the Volga and Don region of Russia), when its ruler, Bulan, together with many of his people, embraced Judaism. They built many synagogues, learned Hebrew and studied Rabbinical literature under the tutelage of teachers imported from the older Jewish centres.

While it is true that many individual Gentiles even after that time became proselytes, it proved dangerous for any Jew known to have had a hand in converting them. Often, whole communities would be punished for one Christian's conversion to Judaism. For example, in 1012, a German priest, Vicilinus of Mainz, became a Jew and then wrote essays in which he used the Bible to demonstrate the continuing validity of Judaism. Within a few months Emperor Henry II expelled the entire Jewish population of Mainz. A decree issued in 1235 by the Church Council of Tarragona, in Spain, ruled that any Jew trying to convert a Christian was to be killed and his property and money taken away. In addition, the entire Jewish community to which he belonged was to pay a costly fine. Similar stringent steps were taken in other countries throughout Christendom, so that all Jewish missionary efforts finally ceased.

Jews Stopped Seeking Converts Only Because They Were Forced

The point cannot be overemphasized that Jews stopped seeking converts to Judaism only because they were forced to, and only then did vigorous discouragement of would-be converts become the official Jewish policy. In the words of rabbi Solomon Luria (1510-1573), perhaps the leading European Talmud scholar of the sixteenth century: "Under the present conditions, when we live in a country that is not ours, like slaves under the rod of a master, if a Jew encourages someone to become a proselyte he becomes a rebel against the government, subject to the death penalty... Therefore, I caution anyone against being a party to such activity when the law of the state forbids it, for he therefore forfeits his life."

Time Once Again To Seek Converts

Since these conditions no longer apply in North America (they still do in many Islamic countries), it is time to seek out once again those who would join our Kehilla and ensure the survival of Judaism and Israel. A steady vigorous influx of sincere converts would revitalize our largely jaded, assimilated North American community. Jews-by-choice, who come to our faith through study and knowledge will teach "born" Jews how to love the ethics, morality and message of our religion, which many of us have forgotten or ignored for so long. Our Yeshivas and seminaries must turn out a whole new class of specialized missionary rabbis, who will welcome into our ranks, once again, the likes of Hillel's teachers Shammai and Avtalyon, King David's great grandmother Ruth, the Roman aristocrat and great Torah commentator Unkelos, Flavius Clemens (nephew of Emperor Vespasian), Bodo-Eleazar (former court decon of Louis the Pious, 9th century), Andreas of Bari (former Bishop in Italy, c. 1100), Rabbi Akiva's grandfather, and Joseph's wife Asenath (who, though not born Jewish, raised such fine Jewish boys that we bless our sons every shabbat to be like her sons, Manasseh and Ephraim).

We must replenish the millions slaughtered over the centuries by Titus, Torquameda, Chmielnicki, and Hitler, and deny their ultimate victory. We must ensure our survival in order to continue to be "a light unto the nations."

Immigration And Multiculturalism: A Dissenting View

by Stephen Stern

The issues of immigration and multiculturalism continue to be of considerable interest to Canadians generally and to Jews in particular. The recent killing of a Toronto police officer by an illegal immigrant and the release of a government study putatively demonstrating that immigrants to Canada are better educated and harder working than native born Canadians have only served to make this public debate more torrid.

Jews, for historically obvious reasons, are particularly sensitive to the increasingly heated polemics surrounding immigration today. Many are especially and understandably wary of those who are critical of Canada's much vaunted liberal immigration policies. Sergio Marchi and others have skillfully and eloquently outlined the usual arguments advocating the beneficial effects of immigration and multiculturalism. Many Jews agree profoundly with the minister's view that continued high levels of immigration are a social desideratum of the first rank. Many Jews do not.

The purpose of this essay is to outline the possible perils of our succumbing to the languidly romantic and naive view of seeing immigration as a purely bountiful blessing. This writer will argue that Canadians should resist the siren song of unrestricted multiculturalism because not only will it serve to tribalize and ghettoize Canada, but it may very well threaten those very foundations of Canadian society which have proved so agreeable to Jews who have immigrated here.

One prefatory comment concerning refugees is needed here. There is no one, on either side of the immigration debate, who does not vigorously defend the notion that canada should continue to be a haven for genuine refugees - that is, those who legitimately meet the criteria of the United Nations Convention. Undoubted refugees would, of course, include such groups as the Jews from the former Soviet Union, Vietnamese boat people, Haitians, and those Chinese fleeing the persecutions following the Tiannamen Square massacres. Frivolous refugee claims, such as the perhaps apocryphal one made by some Saudi Arabian women claiming discrimination on the basis that they were refused driving licences in their own country, trivialize those who are truly persecuted and should not warrant serious consideration.

Opponents of Increased Immigration Not Fascist

In addition, it is unfortunately necessary to state unequivocally that men of good will and decency can take differing views of the entire immigration question. It seems to me that too many Canadians are too quick to label those who argue for reduced levels of immigration as crypto-fascists. It may be philosophically disputable for conservatives, such as Preston Manning, to argue that immigration levels should be reduced for economic reasons, but it is not, ipso facto, racist to so argue. It serves no useful purpose for those in the pro-immigration camp to label opponents of Canada's present policies as fascistic. To engage in such ad hominem attacks is not only illogical; it is simply indecorous.

Pro-immigration lobbyists frequently lament what they see as sensationalized press accounts about immigrants exhausting Canada's generous social safety nets including health care. they hint that these claims are not only fallacious, but are prompted by ill-concealed racism. What are we to make then of the recent decision by the government of Ontario to eliminate health care coverage for foreign students residing in Ontario, applicants for landed immigrant status, people with temporary provincial work permits, and all family members of the above? The Health Minister has declared that these people are, indeed, costing the provincial taxpayers millions of dollars. Are these claims factual or are they only the racist grumblings of the Minister? There are numerous examples of fraudulent use of the social welfare system. The most flagrant is, of course, the well documented case of the wife of a Somali warlord living on social assistance in the Toronto area. She has returned intermittently to visit her husband in Africa, reportedly traveling first class. To wish to reassess certain aspects of Canada's immigration policies in view of these events is, to repeat, not unethical, racist, or intellectually illegitimate.

Immigration and Multiculturalism Related

The issues of immigration and multiculturalism are intimately related. The undeniable benefits of Canada's ethnic mosaic have been adroitly articulated by numerous minority spokesmen. Interestingly, some Jewish intellectuals even advocate, not entirely without eloquence, that, in view of the sordid history of Christian and European anti-semitism, Canada's

by Stuart Schoenfeld

Unexpectedly, Joan and I were among the first Jewish tourists to visit Palestine. We made our brief visit to Jericho on July 25, only hours before President Clinton, King Hussein and Prime Minister Rabin made history in Washington. We were on our way from Jerusalem to the Gallil, travelling in an eight person minivan with an Arab couple from Texas who were visiting her parents in Ramallah, a young man from Mississaugua and our tour guide.

Our guide, an old-fashioned (aging) labor Zionist, told us we would have a bonus to our tour and proceeded to take the Jordan valley road through Jericho. We drove past the Israeli checkpoint, and then past the Palestinian check point, cameras clicking.

On the outskirts of town we could see workers in the fields of date palms and banana plants, and a couple of shepherds with flocks. Jericho, an oasis cross-roads town of about 16,000, still bore the traces of Arafat's recent visit – wall paintings and posters of the chairman, often with a companion, and many PLO flags. We drove past the former refugee camp. "It still looks awful, just like I remember from my last visit," the Arab American woman said. "But at least now they have a chance."

It was already a hot summer's morning, and there was little visible activity in the town itself. We could see the restored synagogue off to the side of the road, quiet like the rest of the town; our guide didn't mention it. "You can see," he said, "over there Israeli police and Palestinian police making joint patrols." They looked like police everywhere, waiting for something to happen. Some were driving around at slow speed. Other patrols were parked by the side of the road, in the shade.

The "Temptation Restaurant"

"Up there," said our guide as we turned a corner in town, "you can see the Mount of Temptation, where Jesus was tempted." And sure enough, in our line of vision as we looked first up at the mountain, and then ahead at the road, we saw directly in front of us the English language sign of "The Temptation Restaurant." "I'd like to have a picture of that!" said the young man from Mississaugua. "Sure," said the guide, "we take a stop and you can take a picture."

He pulled over next to the restaurant, at the produce and souvenir store, the only open shop in the area, and exchanged friendly greetings in Arabic with the proprietor. Joan went to look at the pottery; the others bought refreshments, and the tour guide shopped for fruit. When the shopkeeper came to help Joan, she greeted him with "Shalom." He replied only with what she later described as a smile of surprise.

The refreshment area contained small posters advertising Israeli ice cream and candy bars. It was almost the first Hebrew I'd seen since we got into Jericho; one restaurant down the block still had "shalom" next to its Arabic and English equivalents. In the other direction, it was possible to see the famous excavation site of Tel Jericho, empty and quiet. Behind the shop and connected to it, the concrete walls of a four story building were newly erected and construction was continuing.

The proprietor was wrapping Joan's pottery when I went into the souvenir shop. "Would you take my picture outside?" she asked me. "You like to buy a head covering, just like Arafat's?" the proprietor asked, showing me a khaffiya. "I give you very good price." "No. Thank you," I said. The young man from Mississaugua tried one on. He actually looked quite handsome in it, like Mel Gibson playing Lawrence of Arabia, but in the end he too decided not to buy.

Outside, Joan positioned herself for her photo in front of the store window. It was decorated with several large pictures of Chairman (or was it now "President"?) Arafat. Above the window, an illuminated sign formerly advertised Coca-Cola in three languages. The corner with Hebrew letters had been smashed out. A few cars drove by, all with the blue license plates given to cars of Arabs in the West Bank. Once, a military vehicle, followed by three cars with Israeli licenses, drove by convoy style – fast, almost bumper to bumper.

The Boy With the Rock

After about a half an hour, we drove up the road of the Palestinian autonomous area. On the outskirts of a village just past Jericho, a boy of about bar mitzvah age was walking in the shade of the trees that line the road. He looked up in surprise at the Israeli tourist vehicle coming his way. He quickly bent over, picked up a stone and started to cock his arm. Then I saw him lower his arm and in a moment we were past him.

In five minutes we were past the checkpoint of the Palestinian police and back in the West Bank. In another half an hour we were over the green line, in the area of the kibbutzim just below the Kinneret. Later that evening, when I told Joan about the boy with the stone, she said, "I thought I heard something hit the back of the van."

The Eccentric Orthodox Jew

The next day, as I was riding the #4 Jerusalem bus, an aging but energetic man got on in the Bukharian Quarter, an ultra-orthodox neighborhood near Mea Shearim. He was talking loudly, to no one in particular, even as he paid his fare. He was, apparently, one of the crazy eccentrics found in Jerusalem, a city whose deep cultural divisions and intense self-consciousness seem to evoke dramatic self presentations.

He walked the length of the bus, until he reached the rear bench, proclaiming his message, mostly in Hebrew, but with some English mixed in. "Rabin, Clinton, Hussein – they're all jokers. They know it. Those momzerim." And so on from his seat at the rear, until he reached his destination and got off. No one spoke to him. Hardly anyone glanced at him. Most people gave no indication that they noticed.

Significance of the Two Incidents

The boy who is still stoning vehicles and the Jerusalemite unable to keep from talking to nobody in public may not be at the center of the Middle East conflict, but they express something about it that might be missed if attention is devoted only to more rational ways of looking at the situation.

Working groups of Palestinians and Israelis are negotiating the transfer of authority over education, health, social services, police and taxation. The Palestinian negotiators represent the interests of over a million and a half residents. They want to administer their own affairs, to ultimately have their own state, recognized as a nation among other nations. These are issues that are difficult. Disentangling two peoples who are so intertwined is a challenging task. It is, however, a rational task, subject to a reasonable resolution.

The boy with the stone represents another attitude that gets in the way of this kind of reasonableness, but one that has its own rationality. The Middle East is desert or near desert, a hostile environment that can't support much life. In the last century technology has made the land of Israel a greener, more nurturing place and advantage has been taken of the opportunities in international economy. Who knows if in the long run, the land and the economy will sustain the vastly increased number of Israelis and the vastly increased number of Palestinians? One doesn't have to be an Islamic fundamentalist to have anxiety about this, but this anxiety does fit into the outlook and emotions of fundamentalist Islam and are likely a part of its appeal.

The ultra-orthodox eccentric from the Bukharian Quarter troubled by the agreement with Jordan is expressing another kind of anxiety. The agreement with Jordan, unlike the agreement with the PLO, was approved in Israel by a large public consensus. So what was troubling the passenger on the #4 bus?

Sunday Shopping Between Israelis and Jordanians

Readers who know Ontario will understand a two word answer – "Saturday shopping." For the rest of the world, here is a longer explanation: The news was full of the diplomatic and economic implications of the agreement with Jordan. On a personal level, however, the question discussed among many Israelis was, "When will we be able to freely cross into Jordan?" This is an exhilarating prospect for people whose borders are closed and who have had to travel to other countries by air or by sea. There is travel to Egypt over land, but the welcome extended to Israelis has been limited and it is far away from Israeli population centers. Jordan, on the other hand, is not that far from Tel Aviv, Haifa, Beer Sheva and especially from Jerusalem, and its government gives every indication of wanting a warm, cooperative peace. While Jordan is reluctant to open its borders to day trips, they will come. And the day on which Israelis will have the free time to travel will be Shabbat.

Our ultra-orthodox bus passenger understands that the agreement with Jordan is a major step in turning the Middle East into a region where people cross borders back and forth as a matter of course. This may be far off, but it may come, and his future in this transition is problematic. For their part, Jordanian officials also understand that open borders will have personal life-style consequences and have expressed concern about unrestricted Jordanian travel to Israel. It's not in the interest of either Jordan or Israel if Jordanian men get in the habit of driving into Israel in pursuit of alcohol and women.

The Israeli newspapers this summer contain stories about two proposed new roads – one a major highway to go through the center of the country; the other, a road linking Amman, Aquaba, Eilat and Egypt (and perhaps eventually Saudi Arabia). Consider the impact of trucks carrying produce and manufactured goods easily following a ring of roads from Tel Aviv to the Gallil to Amman, to Aquaba – Eilat, and then back up through Beer Sheva to Tel Aviv. An integrated mixed economy using this transportation system is the strategic vision of the current governments in Jordan and Israel. Economic investment, access to the Mediterranean via Israel and a rising standard of living benefit Jordan; regional integration and a new spirit of cooperation with the world economy benefit Israel. This shared vision is a challenge to the peoples of the regions. The Middle East can evolve in the direction of Western Europe or it can remain a region of political violence, closed borders, poverty and limited economic potential.

Will Middle East Become Like Western Europe?

This leaves our bus passenger, his devout co-religionists in Jerusalem, and the settlers on the hilltops of Judea and Samaria with the prospect of the Israeli majority straying even further from the straight paths of religious and national devotion, following even further the false prophets and golden calf of material comfort, even with the possibility that the Israeli majority may ultimately – circumstances allowing – opt decisively to be post-national, post-modern liberal humanists. If the Middle East becomes like western Europe, Arabs and Jews will work together in large-scale businesses, in the arts and sciences, in the universities and in the professions. They will read the same newspapers, watch the same TV shows and movies, buy the same clothes, visit each other, become friends, and develop mixed neighborhoods. Their children will fall in love and figure out ways to make mixed marriage an acceptable practice. If under circumstances of a warm peace in the region, Israelis are going to remain connected to their Jewish past, the custodians of that past are going to have to relate in different ways to the large part of Israeli society from whom they are now estranged.

There are consequences of open borders for the boy with the stone too. The current Palestinian autonomous area around Jericho is quite small. But even if it were extended to the entire West Bank, it would still be very small. If the roads are open, no place on the West Bank is more than a half hour drive from the Israeli border, or from the Jordanian border for that matter. What will happen to the boy with the stone if a modern highway system lays part of the infrastructure for a modern economy in the Middle East? What if most people just won't bother about driving through Jericho, Hebron, or Nablus if they can just as easily avoid them?

Transition to Western Europe a Slow Process

Of course the transition of the Middle East to western Europe is a slow process, a long way off, and may not happen at all. Islamic fundamentalists or governments unable to break out of established patterns may stop the peace process dead in its tracks or reverse the progress that is being made. A nascent Israeli-Jordanian-Palestinian common market could implode like Lebanon. Global over-population, depleted resources and nuclear proliferation may bring about a "new world disorder," in which the prosperous countries of the world might well decide that they no longer have the luxury of throwing their energy and foreign aid into a Middle East that is unable to stop fighting, although they will of course continue to sell weapons. If any of these possibilities come to pass, the tentative evolution towards a Middle East along the lines of western Europe will stop, and we will have to figure out how to live in a different future.

IMMIGRATION AND MULTICULTURALISM

immigrants should be primarily from Asian and third world countries where anti-Jewish sentiments are rare. They further argue that Moslem immigrants are preferable to Europeans because Judaism has closer ties to Islam than to Christianity.

These assertions are curious indeed. It is undeniably true that, in the past, many European societies have been antagonistic to the Jews, and that some Moslem societies, especially during the remarkable Golden Age of the Iberian peninsula, have been uniquely hospitable to the Jews. But to recognize these historical verities ought not to blind us to contemporary realities. The indisputable truth at the moment is that the main source of anti-semitism is neither Christian nor European. Contrary perhaps to the conventional wisdom, most of the much maligned fundamentalist Christians sects are decidedly philo-semitic and pro-Israel. The Vatican, mirabile visu, has recently taken belated but unprecedented steps toward eradicating the last vestiges of anti-semitism within its ranks. We must come to terms with the fact Ernst Zundel and his neo-Nazi buffoons could not muster a corporal's guard of supporters in Canada.

Real Sources of Antisemitism Today

Let us be candid and recognize the real sources of anti-semitism today. In North America, the vicious demagogue Farakhan and his cohorts are drawing distressingly large African-American and African-Canadian audiences with their savage and venomous anti-Jewish tirades. This is a brand of multiculturalism which, to say the least, should be unwelcome in Canada.

Furthermore, on a global level, Islamic fundamentalism is undeniably the most potent and increasingly dangerous provenance of modern anti-semitism. One need only witness the predicament of the State of Israel since its inception and the perilous condition of Syrian or Iranian Jews to see the truth of this statement. Many responsible critics of this country's present policies are urging Canadians of all backgrounds to be profoundly wary of encouraging immigrants whose religion, for example, countenances sentences of death for those who write or speak critically of that religion. Similarly, I doubt whether the richness of our multiculturalism would be enhanced by such charming third world customs as the stoning of adulterers to death or the performing of the grisly and mutilating surgery that is euphemistically called female circumcision.

While it is true Asian anti-Jewish feeling is fortunately uncommon, Canadian Jews should not be unaware of the bizarre but definite presence of anti-semitism in Japan. This writer has yet to see an adequate explanation of this curious and apparently growing phenomenon.

None of the above statements should be interpreted, in any way, to mean that the author encourages a complete ban on immigration from Africa, Asia, or Islamic states, but that Canadians should be aware that unrestricted multiculturalism is a double edged sword and should not be viewed with innocence.

Denigration of Canada's Anglo-Saxon Heritage

Another and perhaps even more disconcerting tendency of some in the pro-immigration camp, is the increasing disdain and, indeed, denigration of Canada's Anglo-Saxon heritage. At the risk of offending the cultural relativists and others who worship at the shrine of political correctness, one must forthrightly ask why are the vast majority of the world's immigrants (of whatever colour, religion, or ethnicity) attracted primarily to such countries as the United states, Canada, and Australia? One can reasonably assume that most would argue that the foremost reasons would include such things as safety, economic opportunity, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the right of property, and the right to democratically elect one's own government. With equal candor, one is compelled to assert that these political and economic virtues are primarily and ultimately Anglo-Saxon in origin. No one can seriously deny that it is the British parliamentary system that is the foundation for many of our freedoms, and that it is the British judicial system with its principles of trial by jury and the presumption of innocence that protect those very freedoms that most of Canada's immigrants find so attractive. In fact, for these reasons, this writer passionately believes that it behooves every immigrant to Canada (and perhaps most of all, the relentlessly persecuted Jews who found safe haven here), to pay perpetual homage to our Anglo-Saxon patrimony. It is the indispensable social glue that permits the vibrancy and flowering of Canada's ethnic diversity. We minority groups, enjoying the sweet fruits of Canada's British heritage, must be constantly alert to the threat that unrestricted and unlimited multiculturalism does not become the Trojan horse which would undermine this glorious inheritance. These truths may be unpalatable to some, but it would be unseemly to deny them.

Canada should continue to welcome, in numbers consistent with its economic requirements, decent law-abiding people of all colours and ethnicity, but only if they agree to recognize and honour the principles of freedom, civility and toleration that have made this country so desirable in the first place.

CONTINUITY DEBATE

assimilation to remain within the fold. It will not be an easy task that can be addressed simply by sermonizing about the virtues and responsibilities of being Jewish.

Throughout our history, an ongoing succession of rabbis, scholars and philosophers fashioned new tools, new interpretations and ideas for Jewish survival in changing times; the Talmud, the philosophy of Maimonides, the interpretations of Rashi, the poetry of Halevi, Caro's Shulchan Aruch, the mysterious Cabala which gave rise to Chassidism. The evolvement of various branches of Judaism while causing rifts, nevertheless opened the way to accommodate varying needs and perceptions of Jews who may otherwise have taken the path to assimilation, and finally the Zionist idea that became a reality.

Thus, we must not only develop innovative programs and services but fashion new tools and instruments for survival in these and the challenging times ahead. But if these tasks are difficult, it will be impossible unless every community at the local level embraces the concept of Klal Yisrael.

Jewish Continuity and Klal Yisrael

Herman Wouk once observed that Jews are an army, but one does not ask whether all its soldiers will survive. One asks whether the army is getting stronger or weaker, whether its struggle is nearer or further from success.

We may in fact be an army, but we have too many "divisions" each marching in a different direction to its own tune. Dr. Norman Lamm, brilliant rabbi, philosopher, teacher and author noted a few years ago, "I never thought of the concept of Klal Yisrael as something that is sufficiently obvious to enjoy the status of a slogan."

The truth is that even in these challenging times, when the threat to Jewish continuity exists in various forms and to varying degrees, North American Jewry is heading down a path of increasing fragmentation leading to self-destruction, because the concept of Klal Yisrael is not universally honoured. We are more inclined to embrace that concept with regard to Israel and overseas Jewish needs than we are within our local communities.

Rabbi Lamm notes: "The common denominator of all of us must be our commitment to the highest order of Jewish integration – even in today's fragmented world. Accepting Klal Yisrael does not release us from the obligation to make serious and often painful choices. Whatever has the greatest impact on the unity and destiny of our people takes precedence over whatever has lesser consequences for the welfare and integrity of Klal Yisrael. We are sometimes depressed by the constant bickering, by the clash of interests, biases and preferences that often mark our Jewish meetings and deliberations. There is nothing wrong with that and there is no way to escape the fracas and fray that frequently accompany the setting of priorities. We should not fear confrontation and welcome diverse opinions. But the idea of Klal Yisrael establishes these caveats; a) that all participants acknowledge the primacy of Klal Yisrael over its individual parts, and that therefore we reject those views that would undo the unity of Klal Yisrael and b) that the tone of the discourse be civil, respectful, tolerant, sympathetic and even more – evince concern for the other position, the one we may consider only of secondary importance."

The Central Role of Federations

Similar to what has happened in the United States, Federations have become the dominant force in each of our organized Canadian Jewish communities. Not only are Federations the largest fund raisers and disbursers of communal funds, but they have shifted more of their resources to what they consider "community building" activities. Jewish continuity has now moved to the top of their agendas which gives Federations entry, directly or indirectly, into every facet of Jewish communal life.

The question is whether this self-determined Federation mandate will strengthen the cause of Klal Yisrael. The reverse could well be true if this expanded agenda creates greater friction with organizations and institutions who perceive this as Federation's intrusion on their respective turfs. Furthermore, should Federations recognise the need for an all-inclusive functional, communal embrace of Klal Yisrael, they will have to open themselves up to greater scrutiny and greater accountability to their respective constituencies. Federations may indeed be reluctant to do this, because it may be perceived as a threat to their entrenched policies, practices and leadership, as well as to changes in traditional funding patterns.

Conclusion

No matter what the demographics tell us or how we interpret them, no matter whether the Canadian Jewish community is shrinking or expanding, no matter how many task forces, committees or organizations examine the question of Jewish continuity, the truth is that the attachment of Jews to their Jewishness is diminishing with each new generation. We see it happening before our very eyes, within our own families and within our communities, large and small, to lesser or greater degrees.

The issue of Jewish continuity represents the ongoing confrontation between Jewish identity and modernity, and modernity is winning the battle. If Jewish communal "Decision Makers" hope eventually to stem the growing tide of assimilation, intermarriage and Jewish alienation, they can't conduct business as usual merely by ploughing more money into doing more of the same. They need to expand and intensify their research and development projects, develop strategies and action plans to take advantage of new and evolving communications technology, create new instruments of survival, and make the concept of Klal Yisrael our most potent weapon for unity in a house that has been divided for far too long.

Drafts of reviews,
fragments of attempted poetry scattered on my kitchen table.

I spent days that spring cracking the code of your novel, deciphering Danile, the father loving but blind,

his estranged daughter
charged with experience:
that heart-rending narrative which brought a redemptive myth to the cold streets of Winnipeg, reprieving the darkness with shards of light that we too were cast in the first time we met under the sun-splintered shade of towering maples

on Bernice Lever's backyard patio.

When I raised the penury of the artist as if it were some holy banner, you, pragmatic, countered with the Chinese induction:

"Eat first – poetry second."
In profile, physique and close-cropped hair
I likened you then to Gertrude Stein

for I was reading correspondents into every tone and gesture, preparing myself
for a life on the line.

Canadian business expects boost from Canada-Israel free trade deal

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — A proposed Canada-Israel free trade pact would, among other benefits, give Canadian businesses a greater access to the booming economy of the Middle East, observers concured following last week's announcement here by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin that negotiations between the two nations will begin.

Steven Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, said an agreement will give Canadian companies access to the Israeli market equal to that enjoyed by the United States and the European Union, which already have free trade agreements with Israel.

"In addition, a Canada-Israel free trade agreement will give Canadians direct access to an increasingly stable and integrated Middle East economy, of which Israel is an integral part," he said.

In 1993, Israel imported $28 billion worth of goods. Two-way trade with Canada amounted to about $310 million, with Canada exporting $155 million of goods to Israel and importing about $154 worth of goods from the Jewish state.

Wheat was Canada's largest export to Israel, followed by aluminum, wood pulp and sulphur. Leading Canadian imports from Israel were diamonds, followed by fruits and vegetables, machinery and medical equipment.

Canada's trade with Israel has increased 20 per cent in the last four years. Even so, trade barriers have restricted Canadian access to the Israeli market.

High tariffs on products such as drugs, bio-technology, telecommunications equipment and wood products put Canadian manufacturers at a disadvantage compared

Beilin in Toronto

TORONTO — Without territorial compromise, Israel will not know peace, the Jewish state's outspoken deputy foreign minister said here last week.

But Yossi Beilin, speaking at a luncheon sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs, said, "It doesn't mean we have to give up everything."

The News In Brief

CANADA

Freeman Reappointed

HALIFAX — Halifax lawyer Lawrence Freeman was re-elected president of the Atlantic Jewish Council at the organization's ninth biennial conference held here recently.

Freeman will serve a second two-year term.

The entire slate of officers was returned for a two-year term, including chair Ivan Levine of Fredericton; first vice-president Victor Goldberg; second vice-president Sheva Medjuck; treasurer Mark Rosen; and secretary Barbara Paton, all of Halifax.

Members-at-large include Seymour Prince, Sherry Pink, Larry Riteman and Cathy Zilbert, all of Halifax, and Irwin Lampert of Moncton.

Other members-at-large, from Cape Breton, Annapolis Valley (N.S.), Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Fredericton, Moncton and Saint John, will be elected in their communities.

Jacquelin Holzman

Holzman Re-elected

OTTAWA — Ottawa's Jewish mayor, Jacquelin Holzman, was re-elected in the recent municipal elections, after pledging to lower taxes and control city spending.

Holzman beat two city hall veterans by garnering 34,117 votes.

A handful of other Jewish candidates were running for regional and city councils, but all were defeated.

Zundel "Offends" Boyd

TORONTO — Writings by pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel will be referred to the Crown, which will consult with police over whether hate charges can be laid, Ontario Attorney General Marion Boyd said recently.

Boyd said she was "offended" by the material, but said her office can only agree to charges when police lay them, "and this has not happened."

She was responding to a query by Tory MPP Charles Harnick, who quoted passages in the Legislature from Zundel's Power: Zundelists Versus Zionists, which warns that "aroused" Gentiles will one day "mete out justice and vengeance," and "use the eminently successful policies of Hitler."

Holocaust Museum Trip

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's Jewish community is taking bookings for a spring trip to the Holocaust museum in Washington, D.C.

The $1,200 per person tour is scheduled for March 31-April 4, and includes airfare, daily breakfast, sightseeing, visits to the Canadian and Israeli embassies and an organized tour of the museum.

Organizers are aiming for at least 30 participants. For details, contact Evelyn Hecht at the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, (204) 943-0406.

Fewer Resolutions

MONTREAL — There won't be a repeat of the 1992 Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Plenary Assembly, when 112 resolutions were adopted.

CJC has decided that at its next plenary, May 14-15 in Montreal, only about 18 resolutions will be debated. They will be selected because they "effectively move CJC policy in new directions or seek to change longstanding positions," said national resolutions committee chair Reisa Teitelbaum.

CJC head office is asking its regions to rank in order of priority their submissions to the national resolutions committee. The deadline is Jan. 31, 1995.

ISRAEL

Jordan Envoy Named

JERUSALEM — With Israel and Jordan prepared to open embassies in each other's capitals on Dec. 10, Jordan has appointed Dr. Marwan Muashar as its first ambassador to Israel.

Muashar, who served as spokesman of the Jordanian delegation during earlier peace negotiations with Israel, has also headed Jordan's information office in Washington.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry was expected to name an ambassador to Jordan this week. Israel Radio reported that the diplomat will be chosen from the ranks of the Foreign Ministry.

Bomber's Home Destroyed

JERUSALEM — The Army last Monday night demolished the home of the Tel Aviv bus bomber, Salah Assawi, in the West Bank town of Kalkilya several days after the High Court rejected an appeal from the family.

The Oct. 19 bombing claimed 23 lives, including Assawi's.

In its 21-page decision, the court said the Army had the authority to destroy the house. It also upheld the security forces' view that destroying the homes of Palestinian assailants would deter terrorists.

Dutch Honored

JERUSALEM — Almost 50 years after the end of World War II, 36 Dutch citizens were honored last week at a special ceremony at Yad Vashem.

Members of the group saved Jewish children during the Holocaust, some of them hiding up to five children in their homes during the Nazi occupation of Holland.

This is the largest group of citizens ever to come to Yad Vashem from one country for such a ceremony, the memorial institute's spokesperson said.

Mosaic Dove Found

BEERSHEBA — Antiquities Authority archeologists have uncovered a mosaic of a dove with an olive branch in its mouth in a 4th-7th century Byzantine church here.

Because of the 1.5 by 2-metre mosaic, they have dubbed the structure the "peace church." The authority is conducting a rescue dig, as the site is slated for construction.

WORLD

France to Contribute

PARIS — Saying that the dark history of the Holocaust "must be remembered," French Prime Minister Edouard Balladur announced last week that France will contribute about $2 million to help with preservation efforts at the site of the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camps.

Balladur also announced that he will ask the French Parliament to strengthen legislation against racist and anti-Semitic acts. He added that France and Israel will expand their economic and cultural ties.

Kuchma on Anti-Semitism

NEW YORK — In his first meeting with American Jewish leaders, newly elected Ukrainian President Leonid Kuchma pledged to fight anti-Semitism in his country.

"We are not indifferent to cases of anti-Semitism in Ukraine, but the malignant term of neo-Nazism does not exist in Ukraine," Kuchma told the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations here last Sunday.

"I promise that as president I shall fight against such phenomena," he said.

The Ukrainian leader said he recognized that his country's history "had black and bloodshed chapters" regarding Jews, and called for the establishment of a museum at Babi Yar, the site of one of the worst massacres of Jews during World War II.

Peace Affects Mossad

LONDON — The onset of peace is already affecting the Mossad — Israel's foreign spy service — where sections dedicated to Jordan and Gulf states are being phased out and transferred to the Foreign Ministry, according to the London-based newsletter Foreign Report.

"Desks handling Morocco and Tunisia will probably be next, followed, perhaps, by Syria and Lebanon," it said.

In response to regional changes, it noted, the head of the Mossad has been pointing to the threat from Iran as justification for more money, arguing Iran still sponsors terrorism and is seeking nuclear weapons.

Deals With China, S. Korea

BEIJING — Israel's Communications and Science Minister Shulamit Aloni last week signed a mail and telecommunications cooperation agreement with China. China's communications minister agreed to visit Israel next year.

In Seoul last Monday, Aloni — the first Israeli minister to visit South Korea — signed a deal promoting joint research in communications and various scientific fields. She participated in the first binational Korean-Israeli symposium in Seoul with her counterpart, Kio Si Joong.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is planning to visit South Korea and Japan in mid-December, the Israeli Foreign Ministry has announced.

The trip will mark the first time an Israeli prime minister has paid an official visit to either country.

Israel set to join la Francophonie

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israel will probably be made a member of la Francophonie when the association holds its next summit in the African country of Benin in the fall of 1995.

La Francophonie is the official representative body of countries or populations throughout the world which use French in any significant capacity and share a common French cultural identity.

Israel's possible membership was discussed privately by the heads of state who met on the island of Mauritius at the last summit of la Francophonie in 1993.

A recent Gallup Poll indicates 22 per cent of Israelis (more than a million people) have a knowledge of French to a greater or lesser degree. Of those, 28 per cent have French as their mother tongue.

They come from the Maghreb (North-West Africa), Egypt, Lebanon, Romania — and France. About 50,000 Israeli citizens are of French nationality.

Thirty of the 120 members of the Knesset speak French fluently.

The poll also shows a majority of Israelis (54 per cent) in favor of increasing the number of hours of French offered in Israeli schools. In addition, 2,000 students are enrolled in university French departments and conversational French courses are taken by about 3,000 adults.

The Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, the diplomatic relations between Israel and Jordan, and the possibility of an ultimate peace agreement with Syria will make it easier for Israel to become a member of la Francophonie.

Arab-Israeli peace will in itself increase the importance of French, because Israel's new relations with most of the Maghreb and other African nations will have French as the principal language of communication.

Reform Jews hold CCRJ convention

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 300 delegates attended the recent biennial convention of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism (CCRJ).

The Nov. 10 to 13 convention, held in Mississauga and Thornhill, drew together representatives from Canada's 23 Reform congregations. The synagogues collectively represent approximately 8,500 families across the country.

Following a pre-convention study session, delegates attended a Kristallnacht commemoration service held at host congregation Temple Solel.

Programs included planning workshops for congregations with fewer than 100 families, outreach training for intermarried synagogue members, and the induction of Newmarket's Or Hadash Congregation into the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, of which CCRJ is a member organization.

At the lay level, the Canadian Council of Reform Zionists, or Kadima, voted to change its name to ARZA-Canada. Dr. Harvey Zimmerman was re-elected as its president.

Charlie Rothschild of Waterloo was installed as the CCRJ's president, succeeding Austin Beutel of Toronto.

New political movement seen possible for Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A new movement disgruntled over the possible return of the Golan Heights to Syria is leaving the door open to becoming a bona fide political party in time for the 1996 Israeli elections.

According to Yitzhak Mayer, a former Israeli consul general to Montreal, the Derech Hashlishit (Third Option) movement is striking a resonant chord among cautious MKs and ordinary Israelis who believe the government is moving too quickly and giving away too much too soon.

"Seventy-five per cent of Israelis are against giving back the Golan," said Mayer, a member of Third Option's executive committee and of the National Religious Party.

He was speaking with journalists at a recent meeting organized by the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region.

"We're saying let's wait. We can't relive Yamit again."

Mayer said Third Option will consider forming a party if Israel and Syria sign a peace deal that includes evacuating settlements in the Golan Heights.

The group sees the 1996 election as the referendum on the Golan promised by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Third Option was founded by Israeli poet Chaim Gouri. The core of its support comes from conservative Labour MKs like cabinet members Mordechi Gur, Ya'acov Tsur and Shimon Shetrit, although the movement claims followers of every stripe.

A recent analysis in the Jerusalem Post suggested that 19 out of 44 Labour MKs approve of the Third Option's approach.

Mayer told The CJN that the Third Option movement could represent a rift within Labour that will manifest itself if and when Rabin agrees to formally withdraw from the Golan Heights.

And that appears to be the bottom line.

Mayer said the Israeli government has failed to keep its pre-election pledge not to consider dismantling Golan Heights settlements.

Since Syria will never accept partial withdrawal, according to Mayer, any solution for the area must be an all-or-nothing proposition.

Gaza civil war ruled out

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Gaza Strip will not erupt into civil war, says a leading Likud member of the Knesset.

"Nobody believes there will be civil war. I only hear about civil war [in the Gaza Strip] when I'm overseas," Eliahu Ben Elissar told The CJN during a Toronto stop over last week.

Ben Elissar, Israel's first ambassador to Egypt from 1980 to 1981, said the average Israeli mistrusts both Palestinians and Syrians.

Israel's mood "is not what it should be. There's a feeling that the maximum any Israeli is willing to give to [PLO leader Yasser] Arafat will not satisfy Arafat's minimum demands. Arafat says he wants Jerusalem, and we should believe him."

He said street riots like that in which Palestinian police shot dead 15 Palestinians on Nov. 18 can happen again, "but that doesn't mean there will be a civil war."

And despite its peace overtures, Syria is arming itself with advanced Scud missiles and hundreds of tanks, he said.

Ben Elissar was in town to drum up support for Yeshivat Shiloh and the associated Lifschitz Teaching Seminary.

Yeshivat Shiloh, about 35 km northeast of Jerusalem, is a hesder yeshivah, meaning its 200 students serve in the army for 2½ years, then engage in 2½ years of Torah study.

Many of its graduates go on to the Lifschitz Teaching Seminary in Jerusalem, which trains teachers of Jewish studies, Talmud and religion. The seminary, named for the renowned Rabbi A.M. Lifschitz, was established in 1981 and is associated with other hesder and Zionist yeshivot throughout Israel.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue will serve as president of the newly-created Canadian Friends of Lifschitz-Shiloh.

The yeshivah and seminary will host a gala dinner in Tel Aviv on Jan. 7, at which time Rabbi Kelman will be formally installed as a lifetime director of the seminary and president of the Canadian Friends. Expected to attend are Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau and former Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir.

Ben Elissar, who addressed two small groups of Toronto donors last week, said yeshivot like Shiloh are needed because "in Israel, we are simply becoming a little less Jewish. We still have a Yiddishe neshama (soul), but I'm sorry to say it's becoming a little less Jewish.

"We are becoming normal. Are Jews permitted to become normal? Yes, but let us be normal and Jewish."

He said the most elite units in the Israeli Army often request hesder yeshivah students to fill their ranks.

Jewish groups back Bill's protection of gays

CJN Staff

TORONTO — Canada's largest Jewish organizations have supported the inclusion of sexual orientation in the federal government's hate crimes bill.

In a letter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, which is currently holding hearings on Bill C-41, Lyle Smordin, national chair of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, said "it is essential that sexual orientation be included with other grounds for hate crimes.

"This issue has nothing to do with same-sex benefits or pedophilia," Smordin wrote. The league "has consistently argued that it is a matter of protection for those who have long been the targets of hate."

Canadian Jewish Congress said last week it too supports including sexual orientation as a basis for a hate crime.

Congress "recognizes that people have been singled out as victims of crimes of hatred. The bill has nothing to do with extending rights to anybody. It has to do with protecting people under the law," said CJC spokesman Steven Shulman.

Bill C-41 would allow courts to impose greater sentences for crimes motivated by hatred towards groups identifiable by their religion, race, color, disability, nationality, age, sex or sexual orientation.

But several members of the Liberal caucus have opposed the section on sexual orientation, pitting them squarely against Justice Minister Allan Rock.

Some Liberals say they want sexual orientation clearly defined. Others want all references to gays and lesbians deleted.

Reportedly, as many as 20 Liberals would vote against the bill if it goes unchanged.

Rock has said he will not amend the bill's section on sexual orientation.

Both B'nai Brith and Congress expect to appear before the committee or file briefs outlining their positions.

Jewish groups welcome race relations body

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — National Jewish organizations are praising the federal Liberals' plans to set up the long-awaited Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

The $24-million foundation, to be based in Toronto, was promised by the Mulroney government in 1988 as part of its redress package to Japanese-Canadians who were interned, relocated, deported or had property confiscated during World War II.

In early 1991, Parliament unanimously passed legislation to establish the foundation, but it was not set up because of budget cutbacks.

In their pre-election red book of promises, the Liberals pledged to create the foundation "to work at the forefront of efforts to combat racism and all forms of racial discrimination in Canada."

Both Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada said last week the foundation is long overdue.

But the project is not without controversy. Members of the Reform Party have condemned the plan, saying it comes just as the government is tightening belts in virtually every other sector.

Arthur Wilczynski, a spokesman for Secretary of State for Multiculturalism Sheila Finestone, told The CJN the project may come in for heated discussion by Reformers but the bill creating the foundation has already been passed.

Wilczynski could not say when the organization will begin operations.

The foundation will receive a $24-million endowment from Ottawa once it begins operations and sets up a board of about 20 directors. Half that amount will be donated by the government on behalf of Japanese-Canadians, as part of the redress agreement.

Interest generated by the sum will be used to fund the organization's day-to-day work.

Clearing house

The foundation will serve as a clearing house and resource centre for community groups, researchers and the public to further understanding of racism and racial prejudice in Canada, Wilczynski said.

But the government stressed that the foundation will not overlap or compete with the Canadian Human Rights Commission or similar provincial bodies.

The foundation's goals are to:

- Carry out research that will contribute to the understanding of racism and racial discrimination.
- Publish research findings for scholars, organizations, institutions, government bodies and individuals.
- Establish and maintain an up-to-date national collection of pertinent materials, to be made accessible to groups and the public.
- Develop policies for the elimination of racism.
- Cooperate with business, labor and public institutions in instituting and supporting programs and activities which aim to eradicate racial prejudice.
- Increase public awareness of the importance of eliminating racism.

The foundation will be a registered charity and its work will be evaluated by the the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism, Wilczysnki said.

Victoria Jewish federation launches fundraising arm

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The Victoria Jewish community has joined federation ranks to raise funds for the United Israel Appeal (UIA) and for local needs.

The Victoria Combined Jewish Appeal (VCJA) is the offspring of the UIA and a formerly dormant Jewish Comunity Federation.

The aim of the VCJA, as approved at a Nov. 20 community meeting at the Jewish Community Centre, is "to coordinate, plan and promote social, educational, cultural, health and welfare programs, and activities of the Jewish community."

The new Federation will serve all of Vancouver Island and the surrounding areas.

By agreement, the longstanding UIA campaign will get at least 60 per cent of funds raised.

Chuck Waldman, who has conducted the annual UIA campaign for many years on a volunteer basis, told the meeting Victoria has a rapidly growing Jewish community of about 2,500.

In the past five years, the community has almost doubled in size and is continuing to grow, he said. Facilities now available to the community are "inadequate."

Even though the Federation has just been given formal approval by the community, a campaign, including a Super Sunday, was held in the fall, chaired by Irving Margolese and Waldman, and a total of $54,817 was raised. Of this amount, 188 contributors specified that $35,283, or 64 per cent, would be allocated to UIA and 223 gifts totalling $19,523, or 36 per cent, would go to the combined appeal. The average gift was $225.

One of the first projects to be undertaken by the Federation is a demographic survey of the community.

The following were elected to the board of directors, half for a one-year term and the rest for two years: Ronald Anderson, Peter Barwin, Bob Friedland, Stephanie Gilbert, April Katz, Michael Peters, Jon Secter, Dr. Stan Shortt, Louis Sutker, David Freeman, Chuck Waldman. A two-year term will be the norm and board members will be able to serve no more than two consecutive terms.

Voting for the board was confined to community members over 16, who contributed at least $18 in 1994.

Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the Vancouver Federation, said he had "provided them [Victoria] with information and advice." Assistance was also given by the Council of Jewish Federations in Toronto.

Lawyer helps process claims for property in Germany

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Claims for property expropriated by the Nazis in the former East Germany could be worth more than $1 billion to former title-holders and their heirs, said a British lawyer visiting Toronto.

Lionel Curry said there may be 190,000 claims for property in the city of Berlin alone, with additional potential for claims in Leipzig, Dresden, Potsdam and Magdeburg.

Much of the property seized by the Nazis from Jewish owners is now prime industrial and commercial space and in one case, is expected to fetch 6 million German marks (about $6 million) when sold, Curry said.

The beneficiaries of that sale are the Canadian heirs of a former title-holder.

Curry said when Germany was reunified in October 1990, the government pledged to honor restitution claims for property in what had been East Germany.

Recent laws state that property taken by the Nazis from 1935 to the end of the war qualifies. The law applies to expropriated lands as well as property that was subject to forced sale at prices far below market value.

Curry said his London firm, in association with Goodman and Carr in Toronto, represents title-holders and their heirs.

Alan Ossip, a lawyer for Goodman and Carr, said the firm represents 12 different family groups making claims on 30 properties.

Claims can be either for restitution (obtaining title to the property) or for monetary compensation.

Compensation usually takes place where buildings have been destroyed or when a bona fide purchaser has taken possession since the war. It is calculated at four times the property's 1935 assessed tax value, which Curry said is only about one-fifth its actual value.

Those who accept restitution usually sell the property, receiving its full current market value.

Some of the property, particularly in Berlin, is very valuable. Curry said he has been involved in claims that vary from 250,000 marks to 6 million marks.

At the end of the day, Curry estimates, there may be as many as 300,000 claims for East German property worth $1 billion. Not all claims net such vast amounts. Curry said he has found that one-third of claimants were entitled to restitution, one-third to compensation, while the final third were tenants on the land and had no valid claim.

Sometimes, individuals with only a tenuous connection to Germany benefit from the claims, Curry said.

He pointed to an Israeli woman who was married to a young German Jew for one week. Her husband was killed during the siege of Jerusalem in 1948 and she later remarried.

Years later she learned she was entitled to $1 million from the sale of a German property. Her late husband's family had been prominent property owners before they were murdered in Auschwitz.

Many Jews in what was East Germany owned apartment buildings as an investment, Curry said. The buildings came under government control following World War II.

Those wishing to make a claim must either know the address of the former property or at least the general area so it can be traced through German records, he added.

For more information, contact Ossip at (416) 597-4091.

Correction

A recent article on "Street Kids" (CJN, Nov. 10) indicated that a young Jewish girl was placed in a Catholic group home. This home was not a Catholic home, but non-denominational.

The policy of Jewish Family & Child Service is to place Jewish children in Jewish foster homes or in its own group home. In certain instances, when there is no Jewish facility available, adolescents are placed in other group homes, none of which have a specific religious orientation.

The CJN regrets the error.

Ottawa shul granted coat of arms

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Congregation Machzikei Hadas has become the first synagogue in the Commonwealth, and probably only the second in history, to be granted a coat of arms by the Crown.

Gov. Gen. Ramon Hnatyshyn and Rabbi Reuven Bulka unveiled the coat of arms at a recent ceremony at the Orthodox synagogue. It is rich with Jewish symbols including Torah scrolls, the Magen David and the Ten Commandments.

Hnatyshyn said coats of arms symbolize community history and values.

"Since this congregation was founded three-quarters of a century ago, its members have helped shape the city and enrich people of every faith," he said.

"In fact, Ottawa's Jewish community has contributed leaders to all levels of government, to business and the academic world. Most of all, it has built an unparalleled record of generosity in supporting cultural, medical and other charitable causes."

The tradition of honoring institutions with coats of arms is about 800 years old. But the only other instance of a synagogue being so honored was when Louis XIV granted arms to a French synagogue in the late 17th century, about 100 years before France gave Jews equal rights.

In 1988, Queen Elizabeth II gave the Canadian Heraldic Authority the power to grant arms to Canadian institutions.

The Machzikei Hadas blue and white shield was designed by Rabbi Bulka and the Chief Herald. Inside are five scrolls, representing the five books of the Torah, and the Ten Commandments. Above the shield is a tree of intertwined maple leaves and Magen Davids, symbolizing the relationship between Canada and the Jewish community.

The motto is a verse from proverbs used in the Torah service: "Etz Hayyim He Lamachazikim Bah V'Tomkhe'has" ([the Torah] is a tree of life to they who uphold it, and they who support it are praiseworthy). Machzikei Hadas means "upholders of the faith".

Rabbi Bulka said the granting of arms signifies Canada's recognition of the Jewish community's contribution to the country.

"How different would have been our history had [all] governments recognized the unique loyalty of Jews to their host countries, and also recognized their unique contribution to whatever country in which they were welcome," he said.

About 500 proud congregants attended the presentation of the coat of arms.

"It was nice to have the Queen and the government of Canada recognize the Jewish community's contribution to Canada, especially in these times of anti-Semitism," said member Donna Klaiman after the ceremony.

The arms become part of the official registry of the Canadian Heraldic Authority. So far the design has been used on kippot, lapel pins and a enormous celebratory cake. Rabbi Bulka said it will also be used on stationary and on a flag to fly at the synagogue beside the Canadian flag.

DINING AROUND TOWN — By: Steven Basil

There's a great new place in Hazelton Lanes that is a "must-see" when you're downtown. Carlos & Pepe's is located at 87A Avenue Road, 2 blocks north of Bloor, and is easily one of Toronto's most unique dining experiences. From its traditional adobe walls with hanging carved masks to the natural woods in the tables and chairs, Carlos & Pepe's takes you on a visual voyage back to the land of the Aztecs. The margaritas are served in fabulously large, hand-made Mexican goblets, which really show a commitment to detail in this restaurant's overall design. Every client at Carlos & Pepe's gets a warm welcome and a complimentary basket of crisp homemade tortilla chips, salsa comes in two bowls – hot and mild. The plates are over-sized with bright colourful designs and piled high with food. And I mean HIGH! Carlos & Pepe's offers all types of Cal/Mex culinary artistry from the "Favoritas De La Casa to the A la California Chicken Mango" and don't forget the all time favorites chicken or beef fajitas.

Live Mariachis will serenade you Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings.

In these times, when most folks are trying to stretch their dining dollar, Carlos & Pepe's really comes through for its customers. Exciting decor, swift and friendly service matched with great food at great prices make Carlos & Pepe's the place to visit. Oh, don't forget the Mexican-style ice cream covered with whipped cream and honey, the best way to cap a great evening at Carlos & Pepe's.

Free trade welcome

Free trade between Canada and Israel makes eminent sense. The two countries are natural partners. Israel's workforce does not compete in Canada's cornerstone economic sectors of natural resources, heavy manufacturing and large-scale grain industries.

For Israel, free trade with Canada means that Israeli producers will have access to an advanced market more than five times its own size.

For Canada, the agreement opens an eastern vista of new and exciting business potential. It levels the playing field between Canadian businesses and their American and European competitors who already trade duty-free with Israel. Indeed, as many analysts have pointed out, the advantages for Canadian businesses are many.

Canadian companies will be able to bid on an equal footing with American or European companies for the billions of dollars worth in procurement contracts signed by the government of Israel.

The elimination of tariffs on Canadian imports will make Canadian products more competitive in the Israeli market. It will also enable Canadian companies to export directly to Israel without the need to rely on American or European subsidiary manufacturing in order to avoid tariffs.

Canadian exporters will be able to rely on Israel's trade agreements with the European Union as a possible springboard into European markets.

In addition, duty-free entry into Israel's markets may also provide a route of entry into an increasingly integrated Middle East economic market, of which Israel may one day be the hub.

Canadian officials have identified several business opportunities in Israel in areas where Canada has significant expertise; for example oil and gas exploration, infrastructure projects such as the railway links planned between Beersheva and Eilat and in the greater Tel Aviv area, telecommunications, software, electronics, biotechnology, environmental and water technologies, real estate and housing.

We commend the governments of Canada and Israel for demonstrating such pragmatic wisdom. We also commend individuals, such as Premier Bob Rae of Ontario, whose provincial government has been an active proponent of Canada-Israel free trade, and organizations such as the Canada-Israel Committee which played a key facilitative role in bringing the negotiations to this point.

The history of nations has proven the symbiotic linkage between economic relationships and political ones. Like water constantly finding its own level, investors seek out regions of political and social stability. Free trade between Israel and Canada is thus an event to be celebrated. It is an eloquent, tangible expression of the flourishing relations between two strong democracies and of an inexorable progress towards peaceful coexistence among the nations of the Middle East.

A cultural triumph

In the midst of terrorist attacks and epoch-making treaties with Arab countries, the news coming out of Israel speaks not only of war and diplomacy but of art and culture.

Israel has just opened its first fullscale opera house, a $50-million (US) project whose very construction is a triumph of the spirit.

Edward Rothstein, a noted New York music critic, notes that the architecture of the Tel Aviv facility conveys Jewish imagery in its giant exterior arches resembling the Tablets of the Law.

House orchestra the Israel Symphony Orchestra will make use of many of the Russian musicians who have come to Israel in the last decade.

Israel has always had a high reputation for its musical ambassadors — Itzhak Perlman, Deniel Barenboim, Pinchas Zuckerman and Shlomo Minz — but while it has been long on violinists and pianists, it has been short on great sopranos tenors and baritones.

It will now be up to Israel, says Rothstein, to cultivate musical voice culture so the New Israeli Opera company may feature native talent. The Israel Vocal Arts Institute, a summer program that trains talented singers, will continue receiving support.

Until Israel begins to develop a cadre of its own composers, the new opera house will present the classical Italian and German repertoires.

Israel's new opera facility says much about the values of Israeli society. Its leaders understand that the world of politics is transitory but the world of art and culture is ageless.

MEMORY OF POLAND

Recently I attended a lecture where the guest speaker, a Polish Jew, said: "Poland is my country." He spoke of himself and his Polish Jewish colleagues as the intelligentsia.

How naive of him. Foolish man. Obviously he has learned nothing from history. Our history.

We do not want any more dead martyrs.

I remember too vividly as a child of four, my face pressed against our window pane, watching in awe the usual Sunday morning parade in our village, Logev.

The priest in all his regalia was carried to the cloister, with all his parishioners following. When suddenly one of his good Christians threw a stone, smashed our window, spitting out the word "Zhidu." My face bleeding, I rushed to my mother, who was busy at the stove.

"Momma, momma," I cried, "I didn't do anything. I was only watching the nice parade."

It would be wise for the speaker and her colleagues to put all that enthusiasm in the direction of Israel — instead of walking on eggshells.

Israel is our country. Our only country. Everywhere else we are a visiting participant, a tenant.

QUERIES JERUSALEM REPORT

Your Nov. 17 headline article on Chief Justice Antonio Lamer's visit to Jerusalem quoted Oren David, head of the Canada Desk at the Israeli Foreign Ministry. In it, he justifies the escorting of Mr. Lamer by his Israeli counterpart Chief Justice Meir Shamgar through Jerusalem with the remarkable statement that "a foreign dignitary escorted by an Israeli does not suggest support for a permanent Israeli occupation of the territories." The article goes on to say that David reiterated Israel's responsibility for security in the "disputed" areas.

I am shocked that anyone in the Israeli government could refer to any area of Jerusalem as "occupied" or "disputed." Jerusalem, as we all know, was annexed by Israeli law following the Six Day War and time and again, Israeli governments have confirmed that Jerusalem will never again be divided.

It is painful enough to watch the Israeli government concede areas that are the essence of Jewish history; Shechem, Hebron, Judea and Samaria. And it is clear from their actions that they are preparing for a total withdrawal from the territories. What has happened to Jewish pride?

Oren David should tell the Canadian Embassy in clear and strong terms that Jerusalem is the undisputed and undivided capital of Israel.

BAD NEWS FOR ISRAEL

From Sheldon Kirshner's report, CJN Nov. 10, on the address by Gary Rubin at the dinner honoring Mel Shipman, I gather that the main preoccupation of the Israeli government should be the welfare of the Palestinian Arabs and to avoid their frustrations, as it would be detrimental to the ongoing peace process. As for the Israeli "settlers," Rubin said this should be no big problem.

He states that the talks must continue, terror or no terror, and this would mean peace at any price, which doesn't sound very promising for Israel.

NO TRADE WITH CHINA

Why is the Canadian government stooping to do business with the monstrous government that gave the world the hideous spectacle of Tiananmen Square? Jean Chretien should ask himself the age-old question, what will it profit a man to gain the whole world but to lose his own soul?

With Communism collapsing the world over and the Communist Chinese giving their last gasps, why oh why is the Canadian government resuscitating them? Has history taught them nothing? Surely they are aware of the fact that Sweden, to its everlasting discredit, "created thousands of jobs" while it traded with Nazi Germany. They traded with full knowledge of the human rights atrocities carried on by that despicable totalitarian regime.

If governments on all levels are serious about job creation then they should cancel their obscene gold-plated MP and MPP pension plans, cancel the GST, stop subsidizing big businesses, big unions and special interest groups, stop giving millions of dollars to tin pot dictators who have atrocious human rights records and lower our taxes! This, unlike the Chinese charade, would be a truly moral way of "creating thousands of jobs" for Canadians.

FROM OPERA TO BOMBINGS

Anything and everything's possible in Israel

By BLUMA APPEL

Israel and a new opera house! Unexpected? Not at all. Nothing is unexpected in Israel — the land of anything and everything. We were off to inaugurate a new Opera House — not in Toronto but in Tel Aviv.

We glided into Tel Aviv Ben Gurion Airport at midnight on a balmy night, the gentle breezes a welcome change to the weather we left behind.

A smooth taxi drive through the darkened sleeping streets of Tel Aviv brought us to the bright bustle of the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel. No one there seemed to be concerned about the lateness of the hour — it was business as usual. People sat in groups drinking coffee throughout the lobby — a veritable Tower of Babel — discussing politics or business as the subject of choice.

The next morning I was awakened by screaming sirens, said to my husband, "Sounds like New York," and dozed off again. When we had breakfast and went about our business, everything seemed normal if a bit quiet.

Three hours later, we learned of the terrorist bombing of the bus on Dizengoff Street that had left 22 dead.

What was amazing was the normality of the day — no hysteria, no panic. Just grim faces and quiet voices.

Thus began our first day in Israel. We had come to celebrate the opening of the Tel Aviv Opera House but now expected the event would be cancelled. This was not a time for celebration. But no! Word spread quickly: "We grieve and mourn in private — but life must go on or the terrorists win. And they must not win."

I thought that so horrendous a tragedy would traumatize the population, that they would become fearful and apprehensive. I was wrong. My husband and I joined the crowds on Dizengoff Street and defiantly staked out our seats in a crowded cafe. Feelings ran high but voices were low.

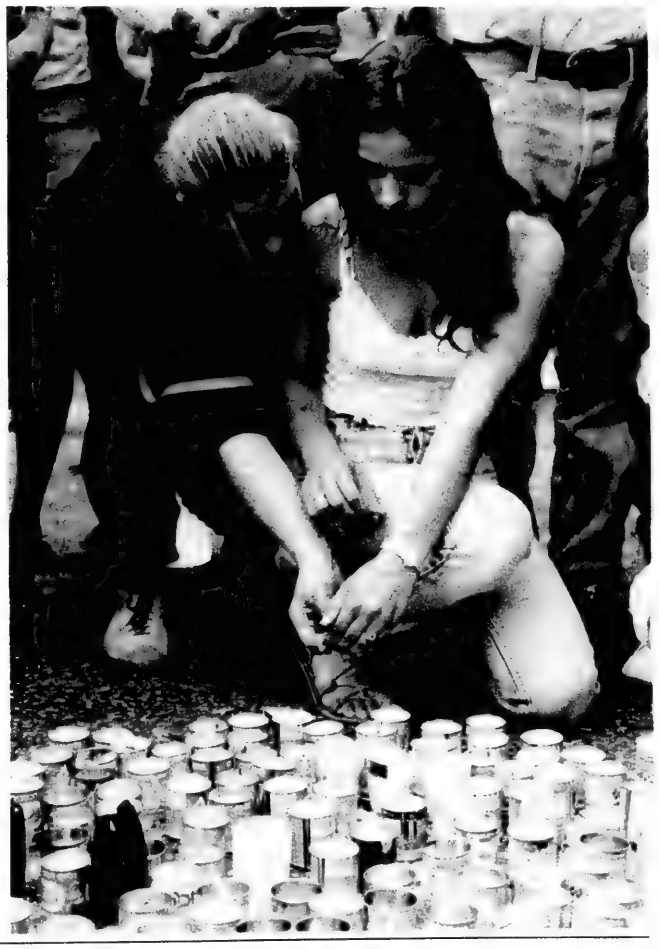
That evening, people began to gather where so many had been killed or maimed a few hours earlier. And a candlelight vigil began — growing in number every day and every night. The grief was great, the anger monumental, and the determination to overcome the bloody, brutal enemies became stronger with every passing moment.

Candlelight vigil grew each day

This was the week that would witness the signing of the peace agreement with Jordan; the bomb was timed to derail the peace movement. Instead, it strengthened the resolve of the Israelis, a people who live constantly on the edge — coping and growing in their own unique way. Their strength lies in their common cause and grim determination.

We did go to the opening of the Opera House. And what an outstanding building it is! Opulent and functional. The exterior blends into the existing Golda Centre, yet maintains its own character. The interior is equipped with state of the art acoustics, lighting, backstage and orchestra pit. Tel Aviv has the audience to appreciate and fill its seats regularly.

We felt we were privileged to attend the opening of this magnificent structure, to share the sorrow and the pride of Israelis, and to celebrate a new and lasting monument to the culture and the spirit of Israel.



Holocaust revisionism exists in many forms

By ARNOLD AGES

One of the great ironies in modern times is that the Holocaust, which was a footnote to World War II for most historians, has come to the fore while the greatest war in the 20th century has receded into the background.

The Nazis' attempt to destroy, root and branch, all of European Jewry has become a focus of scholarly attention and is now being documented in intimidating detail by researchers all over the world. Scarcely a week goes by without Publishers Weekly recording the publication of a new book on Holocaust themes.

Inevitably, an event of such catastrophic dimensions is bound to engender a wide range of responses within a quite legitimate spectrum of opinions and beliefs. The way in which the Jewish community has decided, on an annual basis, to commemorate the Holocaust, seeds the very soil in which those opinions are formed.

There are three major areas (among many) of contention within the Jewish community regarding a new kind of Holocaust revisionism that, while unlike the deniers syndrome, still rankles the conscience of the community.

The first is the subtle attempt among certain circles to Christianize the Holocaust. Segments of the Catholic and Protestant churches are trying, clumsily, to transform Jewish suffering into Christian spirituality and piety. In a recent issue of the Jerusalem Post, a correspondent reports that Christian worship facilities, religious insignia and prayers are becoming staple features at three of the most prominent concentration camps — Sobibor, Dachau and Birkenau-Auschwitz.

On the surface, it is unobjectionable for Christians to mark permanently the site of the greatest atrocities visited upon humankind. However, the Catholic and Protestant institutional presences in the camps deliberately obscure, ignore and hide the purely Jewish dimensions of the catastrophes represented by those death camps. The universalization of the suffering there, however noble an exercise, demeans the fact that the majority of the victims died not as universal symbols but as flesh and blood Jewish men and women.

The second issue now causing consternation is the new focus on righteous gentiles who risked life to save hunted Jews during that period when the swastika came very close to blocking out the sun of humanity for all time. Books, articles and symposia highlighting the pious role of these individuals have become commonplace. Schindler's List was the cinematic consummation of this trend in Jewish life.

Now a mini-backlash has occurred and serious filmmakers such as Claude Lanzmann (Shoah) are suggesting that, given the miniscule percentage of people who helped Jews during the Holocaust, it is inappropriate for the community to preoccupy itself disproportionately with recognizing their heroism. Lanzmann does not argue against the principle of recognizing that heroism, but only against the degree of attention.

Lanzmann's criticism, however, is two-pronged because he also argues against the propriety of survivors celebrating the virtue of the Christians who saved them. This, he claims, obscures the tragedy of the millions who did not survive and who have no voice to reconstruct what happened to them at the hands of the Nazis and their multi-ethnic collaborators.

Ironically, according to Lanzmann, the survivors' testimonies are silencing the voices of the martyrs. Raul Hilberg, the great Holocaust historian, would undoutedly agree with Lanzmann's thesis: he says the search for righteous gentiles is part of the Jewish effort to seek heroes in order to assuage the hurt of the betrayal of European Jewry.

Perhaps the most controversial aspect of the Holocaust debate is a view conveyed by Mark Kurlansky and Ruth Ellen Gruber in their recent books, A Chosen Few: The resurrection of European Jewry (Addison-Wesley) and Upon the Doorposts of Thy House: Jewish Life in East-Central Europe Yesterday and Today (Wiley).

Kurlansky argues that Jewish visits to concentration camps is an obsession which is very un-Jewish, and a phenomenon being exploited by the commercialization and hence the trivialization of the concentration camp experience.

Gruber writes about the March of the Living — that institution which brings organized groups of Israeli and North American Jewish youth to Auschwitz — with an uncommonly critical eye. While acknowledging the educational impact the camp has on these young people, Gruber writes that everything about the March of the Living prevents Jewish youth from meeting even liberal Poles.

The anti-Semitism which was part of Polish society before World War II has rarely been acknowledged by Polish governments, and at least one primate of the Catholic Church today in Poland has expressed openly anti-Semitic views. Even under the government of Lech Walesa, anti-Semitism still flourishes in many sectors of Polish society. It is no wonder March of the Living participants are reluctant to fraternize with Poles. That awaits the consent of future generations.

Arnold Ages, a professor of French at the University of Waterloo, is the director of the University's Journalism Option.

Opinion

Bigotry in the guise of scholarship

Revisionism has had an honorable place in recent Jewish history. Back in the 1920s and 30s, Vladimir Jabotinsky headed a movement which advocated much wider goals for Eretz Yisrael than did the majority party under the leadership of Chaim Weizmann. Fifty years later, under new names like Herut and Likud, the Revisionists gained enough support in Israel to form a government under Menachem Begin.

But since then, another type of revisionism has surfaced, and this one is despised by Jews. It is the name for a pseudo-intellectual effort to discredit the reality of the Holocaust. Using books and publicity materials that appear as serious historical materials, they produce dozens of "proofs" that the Holocaust never happened, that instead of six million, it was but a trickle of Jews who died during World War II, and that their deaths were the result either of the war or of typhus or other killing diseases.

Combating this kind of revisionism therefore serves the cause of historical truth, but most people do not really know how to answer the fake allegations of the Shoah deniers. Now, however, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre has published a little soft-cover volume, which is enormously helpful. Sol Littman of the Toronto branch was good enough to send it to me and I read it with great interest. Written by Frances Henry and Carol Tator, it is clear, accurate, and aimed at the average reader who might be faced with revisionist slogans and myths.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Let me give you a few examples.

In the chapter called Myths, a variety of spurious claims are listed. The book tells the reader concisely how to answer them.

Claim: "There were no gas chambers used for mass murder at Auschwitz and other camps."

Suggested Response: Death camp gas chambers were the primary tools employed by the Nazis in their attempt at a "final solution of the Jewish problem." No one — except a fanatical Holocaust denier — can question the evidence supplied by the SS officers who staffed the camps and the commandants who directed them.

Aside from human testimony, thousands of Nazi documents survive and have been carefully preserved in German, American, French, Soviet and Israeli archives. They describe in meticulous detail how the gas chambers and cremation ovens were designed and installed; there are work orders, supply requisitions, engineering instructions, blueprints, invoices and inspection reports. They name companies contracted to do the installation and the subcontractors that expedited the installation.

Before the Nazis abandoned the camps, Himmler ordered the dismantling of the major death factories so that they would not serve as mute witnesses to horrors that took place there. However, one can still visit the sites today. At Auschwitz, the Polish government has preserved one of the camp's infamous gas chambers and crematoria. Thousands visit Auschwitz annually, some out of curiosity, others as a form of pilgrimage.

So much for one small sample. Of course, those who have persuaded themselves that the Holocaust never occurred cannot be convinced by written, or for that matter, any material. They believe what they want to believe, however unreasonable that may be.

But the book is not written for such people. It is written for anyone who wants to counter the spreading mythology of Holocaust deniers. In a recent survey in the United States, one out of three confessed doubts about the Holocaust having occurred.

It is to doubters especially that this booklet is directed. Easy to read and handle — a mere 66 pages — it was published with the assistance and support of the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat of the Ministry of Citizenship.

For copies, you may wish to contact the Simon Wiesenthal Centre at 8 King St. East, Suite 710, Toronto, Ontario M5C 1B5 (telephone (416) 864-9735; fax (416) 864-1083).

One additional observation: the booklet contain four photographs. One of them, facing page 2, shows corpses lined up in a mass grave with civilians tending to their burial. The caption reads: "Nordhausen Concentration Camp, Germany. German civilians carry the bodies of prisoners to the grave which they were forced to dig."

It happens that I was the officer put in charge by the general to supervise the burial. The picture will always haunt me.

Judaicizing Kit could remake Chanukah itself

I'm ready to invent my own Chaunkah presents. I need a few things and if I have to engage in a colorful fantasy life to get them, well, I'll give it a try.

For instance, I need an Automatic Kiddie Hair Braider. As the mother of two daughters with glorious hair, one blonde and one brunette, I find great chunks of my mornings eaten up by hair styling. I actually enjoy brushing their hair and making their braids. That's a pleasure. It's the multiple redoing that depresses me.

By Erica Meyer Rauzin

My blonde has an image of perfection in her mind that the MGM makeup department couldn't achieve. If her part is a smidge askew, if her final curl goes under instead of up, she's despondent, her life is ruined, and I am a a beauty school drop out. Fortunately she's at the age when I can hand her the brush and softly say I'm sure she can do a better job herself.

My brunette is a different story. First of all, she can't do it herself and, secondly, she has a wild imagination. Her idea of what I can do with her hair is endlessly inventive. She wants braids that have braids, twists that defy gravity, and piles of rainbow elastics stacked up and down her ponytail like layers of a totem pole.

She wants them, but I'm having trouble creating them. I am a relatively competent, straightforward braider, but that's about it. Hence, the need for the Automatic Kiddie Hair Braider. Imagine a device that floats gently over their heads, perfectly plaiting any hairdo they can think of as I stand on the sidelines and cheer. Plug it in and, voila, hairstyles for the stars.

For my next Chanukah bonanza, I'd like to receive (they say that giving is better, and they're right, but for now, I'd like to get) a Husher. What's a Husher? It's a machine that makes the dogs be quiet. If I had a Husher, I could sleep through the night instead of having to get up and shush the dogs.

Our dogs — the prissy old cocker spaniel and her devoted sidekick, the big, dumb young mutt — bark enough to scare any burglar away. Thankfully without a burglar, they expend their energy barking at shadows, at trucks shifting gears on the main street two blocks away, at the ice dropping into the ice maker in the freezer, at the breezes and sighs and night sounds outdoors and indoors. They have no judgment, no discrimination . . . ah, but the Husher would. This magic machine's wonderful sensors would detect when the dogs are barking at a burglar, and thus encourage them (one per cent of the time), and when they are barking at chimeras and window blinds, and thus discourage them (the other 99 per cent of the time). And while it hushed them, I could sleep.

The last present I want, and I'll be a little less selfish here, is an Eight Day Judaicizing Kit, to apply to Chanukah itself. I would use my Judaicizing Kit to make our Chanukah celebration more Jewish, less gift oriented, less a pallid take off on somebody else's commemoration, and more of what it should be: a triumphant celebration of survival and continuity, a victory in the struggle against assimilation, a beacon.

My Judaicizing Kit doesn't have to be grand or fancy. I don't need more menorahs, dreidles, latkes, candles or candy. I need more kavanah, more spirit, a happier and loftier attitude, all wrapped up and ready to apply, beginning where most cures should begin: at home.

And once I had made our Chanukah all it should be as a Jewish holiday marking a pivotal moment in our history, maybe then I could branch out and give my Judaicizing Kit to my friends. It isn't bulky or expensive and, unlike my other presents, it doesn't have to be invented. It's right here, in our hearts.

Israeli sportsmen getting better

By NECHEMIA MEYERS

Israeli sportsmen are making their mark in Europe, as evidenced by the fact that Israel's national soccer and basketball teams both reached the European finals by winning tough games.

To be sure, local clubs, with rare exceptions, can't yet compete with the very best in Milan, Manchester and Madrid, but they are getting better, particularly since Israeli businessmen began taking them over and investing millions of dollars in better players — many of them from leading Eastern European teams — as well as in top coaches and improved facilities.

The first to do this was Ya'akov Shahar, who made his fortune selling Volvos, and hopes eventually to make money from the Maccabi Haifa soccer team as well. So far he is still very much in the red, though the team's income is higher than it used to be, because more fans are coming to see Maccabi Haifa games and recently introduced souvenirs are selling like hotcakes.

Rubie Shapiro, a wealthy fish importer, followed in Shahar's footsteps when he bought Maccabi's crosstown rival, Hapoel Haifa. Explaining his motives in a recent interview, Shapiro said, "Hapoel Haifa has always been in my blood. My father was treasurer of the team and my late brother and I were among its staunchest supporters. I always dreamed of playing for Hapoel Haifa; now I am its president."

However, it remains to be seen whether — having reportedly spent $2.5 million to purchase new players — he will go on pouring money into the club.

Third soccer team acquired by businessman

A few weeks ago, a third soccer team, Maccabi Tel Aviv, was acquired by businessmen, not, they say, in order to make a profit, "but to advance sports."

Up to now, Israeli teams have been run by public bodies who were often more interested in political considerations than in winning games. But they no longer have the money required to finance those teams, even with the help they receive from the national soccer pools.

So privatization has become the order of the day in sports, just as it has in other spheres of Israeli life. After all, if the Government has decided to sell off its shares in Bezek, the national telecommunications company, and El Al, the national airline, there is no reason why the Maccabi, Hapoel and Betar organizations shouldn't sell off their teams.

Whether there will be more buyers depends — as it does with other enterprises — on whether they will ultimately make money. After all, there are few businessmen who will invest in a club for sentimental or altruistic reasons.

One source of income, hitherto much less important here than overseas, is the sale of broadcasting rights. A couple of months ago, the owners of Israel's single commercial TV channel outbid the public television station for the privilege of screening all National League soccer games for the next three years, at a cost of $16.5 million, a paltry sum by American standards but a lot of cash in these parts .

The big money will only come, however, when Israeli teams are on a par with the best European clubs and overseas networks also bid for the right to screen their games.

Lanzmann looks at IDF

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Nearly a decade after the release of Shoah, his acclaimed nine-hour documentary on the Holocaust, Claude Lanzmann is back again with yet another marathon of a film, Tsahal.

Shoah and Tsahal — a searching exploration of the Israeli armed forces and its soldiers — couldn't be more different. The first is about death, while the second is ultimately life-affirming.

And yet there is an inextricable connection between these absorbing documentaries.

"The Holocaust," said Lanzmann in an interview in Toronto, "was a massacre of innocents, of defenceless people who didn't have access to weapons, or the psychological readiness to use them."

Tsahal, by contrast, is about "the price of blood," explained Lanzmann, who was in Canada at the invitation of the Toronto International Film Festival, where his five-hour documentary had its North American premiere.

Essentially, Tsahal turns on the struggle for survival of the Jewish people in Israel, many of them touched by the Holocaust.

The Israel Defence Force, the centrepiece of the movie, is portrayed as Israel's Shield of David in wars ranging from the 1948 War of Independence to the 1982 Lebanon War. The focus, however, is on the 1973 Yom Kippur War, with its frightful casualties which wiped out part of a generation.

The protagonists run the gamut from simple soldiers like Avi Yaffe, a sergeant and broadcasting buff who recorded the storming of Israel's Bar-Lev Line by the Egyptian army, to generals like Yanush Ben-Gal, who lost his parents in the Holocaust and was brought to Palestine as a boy amid the confusion of World War II.

The theme that unites them all is Israel's never-ending battle for physical survival and national existence, more often than not assumed today by the offspring of Holocaust survivors. The trauma that joins them in unspoken brotherhood is the long shadow of the Holocaust.

Yet, as Lanzmann observed, Tsahal is also about the conquest of fear and the attainment of courage in the heat and dust and cold sweat of war.

Finally, Tsahal zeroes in on Israel's moral dilemma in militarily occupying territories captured in the 1967 Six Day War.

Like a doting father speaking of his children, Lanzmann is loath to single out the elements of the film he likes best. But when pressed, he mentions several scenes — young, fuzzy-cheeked paratroopers nervously waiting to make their first jump from an airplane; an amiable, self-confident Jewish settler justifying his claim to the West Bank; the Israel Defence Forces' chief of staff, Gen. Ehud Barak, expounding on military strategy and Jewish history; an impassive soldier recalling the fall of Israel's allegedly impregnable defence line along the Suez Canal in the first numbing days of the Yom Kippur War.

Lanzmann, a 69-year-old Parisian whose paternal grandfather was a hero in World War I, filmed Tsahal with a crew of seven and with a budget of 20 million French francs. Filming began shortly after the cessation of hostilities in the 1991 Gulf War, though Lanzmann had already arrived in Israel when Iraqi Scud missiles began falling on Israeli cities and awakening images of the Holocaust.

To his satisfaction, he received full cooperation from the Israel Defence Force. The top brass, he boasted, "liked me and had confidence in me."

Lanzmann was afforded every courtesy, even the rare privilege of flying with F-16 and Phantom pilots after he had submitted to and passed a battery of "severe" medical tests.

"I wanted to experience the sensation of flying with Israeli pilots, with whom I formed personal relationships."

To Lanzmann, Tsahal was easier to make than Shoah. The latter was filmed in a few countries, complicating the logistics. And because he used a hidden camera to record interviews with German war criminals, they assaulted him when they discovered his true purpose.

In all, Lanzmann shot 150 hours of footage, spending untold hours paring it down to a fairly manageable length and leaving out such segments as Israel's commando operation in Entebbe in July 1976.

But even at five hours, Tsahal is an unusually long film. "I have an epic story to tell," he said, visibly upset when a reporter broached the subject. "Tsahal has many layers. And don't forget — there is not one word of commentary."

Lanzmann describes it as a "vertical" rather than a "chronological" film. And, he added, it is not a "documentary." As he put it without elaborating, "It's much more."

Completed last July, in time for admission into the Toronto International Film Festival, Tsahal was feted at European and Israeli premieres in Paris and in Jerusalem last month. According to Lanzmann, its commercial run in Germany, Britain and the United States is scheduled for early 1995.

Israel's historic rapprochement with the PLO, and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's now-famous handshake with Yasser Arafat in September 1993, did not affect the complexion of Tsahal, he noted.

Lanzmann, whose working relationship with Israel goes back to his 1973 film, Pourquoi Israel?, does not consider himself a Zionist. "I'd live in Israel if I were a Zionist. I am a friend — even a brother — of Israel."

Strictly speaking, he does not oppose Israel's settlements in the territories. But, for all practical purposes, "they'll probably have to be abandoned." Israel's occupation, he said, "can't last."

He is convinced that a Palestinian state, encompassing the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, is inevitable.

"You can't fight against the nationalistic will of people. They [the Palestinians] want a state, and they will have it."

He believes that Jewish settlers have every right to live in the territories, regardless of ownership. "If there are Arabs in Galilee, why not Jews in a Palestinian state?"

Lanzmann, a member of the French resistance movement during the war, is hardly a shrinking violet. He regards Shoah — which has been praised to the skies by critics — as "the most influential film" ever made on the Holocaust.

"I knew it when I made it."

In his judgment, Shoah is "a work of art" on an artistic par with, say, the Russian novel War and Peace. He claims that Shoah, which was released in 1985, has been seen by 60 million viewers world-wide and has been the topic of "hundreds of books and [university] theses."

Although he freely acknowledges Steven Spielberg's skills as a director, Lanzmann is critical of his magnum opus, Schindler's List, which won numerous awards and the Academy Award as best film.

Lanzmann wrote a critique of Schindler's List in Le Monde, the Paris daily. He declined to discuss that essay, but offered to explain the rationale behind it.

"I have absolutely nothing against Spielberg," he remarked. "In fact, he is a very good filmmaker."

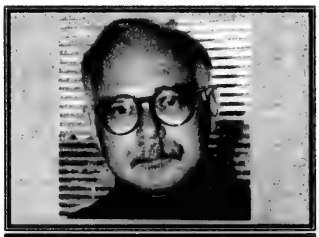
But in his estimation, Spielberg fell short of the mark for a variety of reasons.

- He failed "to invent a new form" in Schindler's List. "He made it like Indiana Jones," said Lanzmann, referring to Spielberg's fabulously successful adventure series.
- Spielberg tried to reconstruct the Holocaust, which, in Lanzmann's opinion, "can't be done."
- Spielberg distorted "the historical truth" of the Holocaust by filtering it through the eyes of a Nazi party member, the chamelion-like Oskar Schindler. "Most Jews didn't have that kind of an experience."

Most of all, it seems, Lanzmann was disappointed because Schindler's List did not establish its credentials as a film of educational value.

With a scathing, wearisome note, he said, "It makes people cry. It will be forgotten."

Is he jealous of Speilberg? A look of contempt filled Lanzmann. "Why should I be?" he roared, pained by the question. "I made a great work which is recognized as such and will remain for centuries. I'm not jealous of Hollywood."



Jewish World

By Sheldon Kirshner

A new biography of Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881) reveals that he fathered two illegitimate children. The disclosure is contained in Stanley Weintraub's biography, Disraeli (McClelland and Stewart, $41.50), the first on the two-time British prime minister in more than a generation.

Weintraub, a cultural historian on the faculty of Pennsylvania State University, discussed his book while attending the International Festival of Authors in Toronto.

In an interview, Weintraub said he learned that Disraeli — a bon vivant, a womanizer and still the only prime minister of Jewish origin in British history — had adulterous liaisons with two women.

His first consort, a married aristocrat, kept the illegitimate child. The direct descendant of that union is a British "gentleman of leisure" today, according to Weintraub.

The direct descendants of the second child, whose mother remains unknown to this day, live in France and New Zealand, and consider themselves Jewish.

Born in London, the scion of Italian Sephardi Jews, Disraeli was the son of an historian and essayist who broke with the Jewish community. When he was 13, his father, Isaac, who never formally converted, had him baptized as a Christian.

Disraeli was always immensely proud of his Jewish background, and was only a nominal Anglican, Weintraub observed.

Disraeli entered politics in 1837 as a Conservative member of parliament. In 1868, he became prime minister, a position he would hold again from 1874 to 1880.

Because he was publicly perceived as a Jew, Disraeli was subjected to "unbelievable" anti-Jewish taunts throughout his career. Anti-Semitism slowed down Disraeli's career tremendously, but ultimately, the Conservative party turned to him because of his political savvy.

A Red Tory by current Canadian standards, Disraeli sought to change the Conservative party from a purely aristocratic one into a popular movement embracing the working class.

Externally, he was an imperialist, expanding the British Empire in India and acquiring shares in the Suez Canal (with the financial help of the Rothschilds, the executors of his last will and testament).

With the sole exception of Sir Winston Churchill, Disraeli was the only British prime minister who was a published novelist. He wrote about a dozen novels — notably Alroy, Conningsby, Sybil and Tancred. Two — Conningsby and Sybil — are still in print.

Interestingly enough, two of Disraeli's novels, Alroy (1833) and Tancred (1847), are driven by Zionist themes. "Alroy was his major Jewish novel, an amazing story of a Jew trying to lead Jews back to Palestine." As far as Weintraub was able to ascertain, Disraeli remained a life-long Zionist.

In life as in death, Disraeli was different. Although he was a professing Christian, his body was prepared for burial by the Rothschilds, and the funeral ceremony was non-denominational.

After his passing, it was said that Disraeli had called for a rabbi as he lay on his death bed. But Weintraub couldn't substantiate that rumor.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

With so many Italian Canadians, we often encounter members of that community. Some have studied with me, and I've found a rapport between Jews and Italians that can be most gratifying.

But when we discuss the history of the Jewish people 2,000 years ago, a formative time which included the fall of the Temple of Jerusalem, I always wonder what those of Italian decent are thinking.

History requires we accurately say, "The Romans persecuted, the Romans destroyed, the Romans killed." After a while it must be tiresome for someone whose is heir to the language of the caesars to hear such condemnations, regardless of their historical truth.

In fairness, I have to point out that part of the fault, dear Horatio, lies in ourselves. Those good ol' boys we call the Maccabees, those brave soldiers who tossed the Syrian Hellenists out on their ears and cleaned up the sanctuary and lit the small oil light that burned for eight days, created the problem with the Romans.

No matter how victorious we like to make our Maccabees seem at Chanukah time, the fact remains that while they liberated Jerusalem, they did not completely liberate the Land of Israel.

Casting about for a strong ally, the Maccabees, led by Judah himself in 161 BCE, struck on the idea of inviting the Romans to be their protectors. Engaged on battlefields elsewhere, Rome promised support sufficient enough to scare off the Syrian Hellenists.

Some years later, Hasmoneans (read, "Maccabees") reaffirmed the treaty with the Romans.

One day, the Romans decided Judea needed more protection than their long Latin words. Rome declared Judea to be in a defence emergency, sent troops, and the occupation ensued — all thanks to a treaty the Maccabees had signed.

As you read this, we're in the midst of Chanukah, the eight days of rededication. Many Jews would like to rededicate themselves to obtaining the power of the Maccabees which defeated tyranny at this season years ago. That's a remembrance of human proportions, but human power is not what the holiday is about. Those same humans who valiantly fought Antiochus and cleaned the Temple also made a mess of our history by tying us to Rome.

There are powers beyond us, of which we have little grasp and which we seem to discover at the ragged edges of our history. Such a time was Chanukah, when a ragtag bunch of Jews felt touched by a power beyond their ken. They spent eight days rededicating the Jerusalem Temple to that power.

The Talmud says the small cruze of oil symbolizes the light that burns within us, the power of a God beyond us and yet parts of us. May we make that light burn brightly enough to inspire our hearts long past this Chanukah holiday.

Jewish groups oppose school prayers

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A broad coalition of religious groups in the United States are vowing to fight any efforts to amend the Constitution to allow prayer in public schools.

In front of the Supreme Court, where school prayer was declared unconstitutional, and across the street from the Capitol, where Republican leaders have promised a vote on a school prayer amendment by July 4, 18 organizations came together recently to voice "unequivocal opposition to a school prayer amendment."

"We are very much in favor of prayer and that's precisely why we're opposed to an amendment," said Brent Walker, general council of the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs.

The coalition includes Reconstructionist, Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Jewish groups, as well as representatives from the Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian and Methodist communities.

Jewish defence organizations including the Anti-Defamation League, American Jewish Committee and American Jewish Congress played an instrumental role in organizing the coalition.

The National Council of Jewish Women and the National Jewish Democratic Council also signed on.

"We believe it is our rabbis, educators and synagogue members who can best convey our religion," said Nina Shanker, staff counsel of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America.

"The government's role is to foster respect and tolerance for religious beliefs," Shanker said, "not to intervene in prayer."

Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Religious Action Centre of Reform Judaism, agreed, saying that a school prayer amendment is "unnecessary, unjustified and unwise."

When Rep. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) threatens "to tamper for the first time in our 205-year history with the Bill of Rights, it sends shivers of fear to all who cherish those rights."

Gingrich, slated to be the next Speaker of the House, has promised to introduce a school prayer amendment before July 4.

Not all Jewish organizations joined the coalition.

The Orthodox Agudath Israel has deferred a decision on whether to sign onto the effort until its five-member Council of Sages re-evaluates the group's position in light of the renewed debate.

"There's now an opportunity for the rabbis to revisit this issue," said Abba Cohen, Washington director of Agudath Israel.

The organization in the past opposed a constitutional amendment, but has not ruled out supporting prayer in schools "if there are iron-clad safeguards built in to ensure non-coercion and non-denominational prayer."

Student wants U of T to end support of group

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The University of Toronto has turned down a student's request to end its financial and logistic support of a campus group the student says published material that "foments hatred against Jews."

The student is also urging Jewish students, their families and others to withhold donations to the university until it takes action against the campus group.

The student, who declined to be identified for this article, said she has taken this action because of a booklet distributed by the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG) that equates Zionism with racism.

David Neelands, assistant vice-president of student affairs, told The CJN "we would not at this time take away recognition" of OPIRG. "We don't censor or limit the expression of a campus group."

Neelands said the group "has distanced itself from the pamphlet and the terrible things in the pamphlet." Looking at the booklet in its entirety, he continued, "it cannot be taken as inciting hatred against Jews. It includes a rather stirring section on anti-Semitism."

The booklet, Making the Links: The Essential Guide to Student Action for Social Change, was distributed at the start of the school year. In defining racism, it equates Zionism with white supremacy, fascism, and apartheid.

In the same section, the booklet's authors acknowledge that Zionism as a "racist ideology" was a "very contentious issue. . . For Palestinians, Zionism has meant militantly oppressive discrimination through the displacement of people, ideas, power and land."

'Didn't repudiate content of booklet'

OPIRG describes itself as a student group with a mandate to conduct research, education and activism on environmental and social justice issues.

In a letter to the university, the student argues that the university supports OPIRG by granting it status "as a registered campus group with access to university services" such as room-booking and audio-visual resources.

The student suggests that "although the university did not formally endorse the booklet, its tacit support of OPIRG as a campus groups in disseminating these defamatory statements has effectively provided OPIRG with a massive public platform in which to insult and harass all Jews at the university and create a hostile learning/working climate."

The student said she raised her complaint despite a retraction and withdrawal of the pamphlet by OPIRG. In a statement, OPIRG apologized to those who were "offended by the inclusion of Zionism as a form of racism. That position is not the position of OPIRG-Toronto. We recognize there is no consensus on a definition of Zionism either within our organization or within the Making the Links Coalition (which authored the booklet under OPIRG's auspices). Given the fact there was not consensus, the inclusion of this issue in the booklet was inappropriate."

The statement attributes the "Zionism is racism" section to someone from "the Palestinian community," and it goes on to say that OPIRG-Toronto "recognizes that Palestinians are oppressed."

Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of the Jewish Students Union (JSU) at the university, said JSU accepted OPIRG's apology even though "we were not really happy with [its] content. It was weak. It didn't repudiate the content of the booklet."

Rabbi Skobac said JSU is aware of the student's letter to the university and will canvass the views of its 22 executive members to determine whether to back it. However, the executive members who have seen it so far are not interested in reopening the issue, he added.

Canadian Jewish Congress believes the issues raised by the booklet have been resolved. "There are those who felt the apology could be stronger but they distanced themselves from it," said Congress spokesman Bernie Farber.

Joshua Katchen, interim director of the Jewish Students Federation (JSF) at York University, said JSF and other students protested the booklet's distribution at York, and some students demanded refunds of their student fees that went to OPIRG (about $3), he said.

The Graduate Students Union (GSU) and the Association of Part Time Undergraduate Students both support OPIRG through student levies but both organizations permit individual students to request refunds. GSU allocates $5 per student to OPIRG, about $30,000 per year, said GSU executive assistant Ruth Perkins.

A CJN call to OPIRG was unanswered.

Glamour is Back

As we bid our not too fond farewell to grunge, we can once again embrace the sophisticated elegance of glamour. Get rid of the layer-upon-layer-hide-everything look and step into soft, lacy, feminine curves in everything from business wear to the cocktail hour (and later).

Suits are still the biggest asset to any business wardrobe but now they are softening up with more tailoring and body hugging fit. Team them with a more yielding frilly or lacy blouse to complete the look.

Another hot item making its way back from the past is the short or to-the-knee dress worn with a matching same-length coat. This outfit has all the presence of a suit but none of the predictability. And judging by the number of designers who presented the dress-and-coat for fall, it appears that it will become an indispensable component of our wardrobe.

Put a little bit of glamour into your weekends too with soft, graceful cashmere sweaters over tailored wool pants or a short skirt with dark tights. It's just the thing to take the chill off without giving anyone the cold shoulder.

Even the accessories are taking on a new shape with narrow belts instead of the the wide bulky ones and strappy, sandaly shoes with high heals instead of the chunky ones. For party dressing gold and silver shoes are making a strong comeback. Remember this whole season's trend is going towards a softer, more feminine, glamorous look.

For evening wear you can never go wrong with the ever prevailing simple 'little black dress'. Of course you don't have to keep it simple. You can have it short or long, shiny or sequined, revealing or coordinated with a short angora sweater. The choices are endless as will the compliments be.

Other choices for your holiday celebrations are shimmering halter dresses, velvet pant suits or metallic sweaters over velvet pants or skirts. The colours making the scene run the spectrum from hot fuschia to snow white to bold red and beyond to metallic gold and silver and, of course, black.

If the occasion is a Black Tie affair then a tuxedo is the way to go. Ever since we saw Marlene Dietrich make an onscreen appearance wearing a tuxedo, we recognized how glamorous a woman can look in one, especially the sunny, fluid versions available now. It is one trend that everyone can look good in. And that's what this season is all about...looking and feeling glamorous and elegant.

Israeli woman is in need of bone marrow transplant

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Up to now, Lior Novick's life has been much like that of any other young Israeli woman.

She took ballet, speech and drama and gymnastics as a child, went to school in South Africa and Israel, and spent two years in the army, serving in the medical corps.

Between stints as a bilingual secretary, she travelled through Europe, the United States, the Far East and Australia.

Then, in March of this year, everything changed.

Twenty-eight-year-old Novick was diagnosed with myelodysplastic syndrome, a serious malfunction of the bone marrow.

Treatment with medication has been unsuccessful, and she currently receives two blood transfusions every three weeks.

The only hope for her is a bone marrow transplant from someone of the same ethnic background (Lithuanian Jewish). Nobody in her own family, including her parents, two brothers and a sister, is a compatible match.

Hadassah Hospital Ein Kerem, where Novick is being treated, is conducting a search of international bone marrow registries.

Family concerned with cost of mass screenings

The family is also anxious to conduct mass blood screenings to find a donor, as Jay Feinberg and others have been doing, but the cost, which the hospital estimates at $50,000, is a serious concern.

The family, the hospital and friends are trying to raise these funds.

Pam and Al Ozery, Toronto friends of the Novick family, are trying to raise funds here for Novick, as well as encouraging interest in her cause. They have been in contact with Friends of Jay, the organization working with Jay Feinberg, and have received advice and support from them, Pam Ozery told The CJN.

In July, Lior Novick was married to Giora Nachsoni, and is trying to live the life of an ordinary newly married woman.

But she, and her family and friends and medical staff, worry that funds won't be raised and a bone marrow donor found before her disease turns into blood cancer.

The Ozerys are trying to establish a Canadian tax deductible donation vehicle. In the meantime, for more information, contact them at 398-3651.

Permanent screening program considered

TORONTO — Mass screenings to find compatible donors for those who need bone marrow transplants have become almost a part of the landscape of Jewish communities around the world.

Probably the best known at the present time is the effort being made in Canada, the United States and Israel for young New Jersey resident Jay Feinberg.

Up to now, this has been done on an ad hoc basis; families discover that neither immediate nor extended relatives are a match, and embark on increasingly desperate searches of those of similar ethnic backgrounds.

Rabbi Danny Schonbuch wants to change all that.

Rabbi Danny Schonbuch

The former Torontonian, now a resident of the Old City of Jerusalem and a teacher counsellor for Jerusalem Kibbutz, a new work-study program for young people, was inspired by a clinic held for Feinberg in Jerusalem in February 1993.

Over 3,000 people were tested, and Rabbi Schonbuch says he "was deeply moved" by the event.

He felt he could use his years of experience, particularly with Network and Nahon, to put together an international group specifically to address the question of ongoing testing.

"Until now, the burden is on the individual family, at a tremendous financial and emotional cost. That shouldn't be."

Encouraged and helped by noted professor and activist Irwin Cotler and doctors from the Shaare Zedek hospital in Jerusalem, he wants to put together an international group to sponsor and raise funds for ongoing testing.

His first efforts are campus drives at Queen's College in New York City, SUNY Binghamton, and the University of Pennsylvania.

He is working with Janis Winocur of the Beth Tikvah social action committee in Toronto to establish a Toronto presence for what he is calling the Miracle Match program, and hopes to interest those from all streams of Judaism.

"I believe the way to save lives is on the grassroots level, through the synagogues," he told The CJN in a telephone interview. He was in Toronto with his wife and young son to promote both the Jerusalem Kibbutz and Miracle Match programs.

One idea he is considering is to establish a bar/bat mitzvah program. When children have their bar or bat mitzvah, he suggests, money could be put aside, so that when they reach 18, funds will already be there for testing.

Depending on available funding Rabbi Schonbuch says, he wants to test several hundred students in Israel for one-year study programs. "Then they will be educated to go back to their own campuses and start other testing programs."

He is fundraising now for a drive in February at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. "I hope to invite the president of Israel to launch the university network."

For more information, contact Canadian Friends of Miracle Match, 81 Hidden Trail, North York, M2R 3S5. — L.S.

Black, Jewish rift blamed on multiculturalism

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bad relations between "some blacks and some Jews"are the result of a failed federal multiculturalism policy, a senior Toronto Sun editor and columnist said here recently.

The failure to build bridges between different cultural groups is one reason why "our multicultural chickens have come home to roost," Lorrie Goldstein told an audience of 50 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"We are not the happy souls, blacks or Jews, that this great social experiment in Canada calls for."

Goldstein blamed the government's immigration quota, which, "even if it was cut to 150,000 immigrants a year, would be double what any other country allows. It is the height of naivete to think that this level of immigration is not putting an intolerable strain on our social resources."

The multicultural policy has led to politicians being afraid to speak out about difficulties between ethnic groups, the Sun editor stated.

"The vitriol behind the attacks [on Show Boat] caught special interest Jewish groups by surprise and the controversy caught us in the media by surprise. Show Boat was a bad experience for both our communities. If there were more bridges in place it would have been better."

Goldstein said he was against a ban on Show Boat or on The Merchant of Venice or on allowing Ernst Zundel to speak, and declared that the North York Board of Education had made a mistake in banning field trips to Show Boat.

The anti-Semitic utterances of leaders of the Nation of Islam are a "cop-out," Goldstein maintained. "First they advise blacks to work hard and stay free of drugs and then they say 'If you don't make it, it's because of this great Jewish conspiracy.' "

The media should share some of the blame in the failure to build bridges because a recent survey showed only between two and three per cent of minorities are represented in Canada's news rooms, he said. At the Sun, the figure is three per cent, and rises to five per cent if part-time staff is included.

Goldstein disagreed wth a questioner who suggested the anti-Semitism of some blacks reflects "anti-Semitism in the population as a whole."

The Sun editor replied: "Most people are not anti-Semitic and most blacks are not anti-Semitic."

Stating "there is a significant crime problem among some black youth," Goldstein said his paper was "creamed" when it pointed out the major problem was with the Jamaican community.

Defending his paper against another questioner's suggestion that the Sun overplays charges against blacks, Goldstein said, "the Sun is an equal opportunity paper. We cover white crime as well as black crime. The Sun won't change its style. It is a tabloid and will continue covering crime heavily."

The program was sponsored by the synagogue's entertainment and cultural connection and the Shaarei Shomayim Brotherhood. Jerry and Sandra Genesove were co-ordinators.

COAT OF ARMS
Gov. Gen. Ramon Hnatyshyn and Rabbi Reuben Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas unveil the coat of arms presented to the synagogue.

Correction

TORONTO — The following paragraph was inadvertently omitted from the article on the Anshei Minsk bachelor auction (CJN, Nov. 24).

"We are indeed fortunate to still enjoy the most beautiful shul in Toronto," said auction chair and self-described den mother Renee Wortzman.

The CJN regrets the omission.

TODAY'S UJA

1995 Campaign Update

With just over five weeks of campaigning to go, a thought from Jewish Agency Chairman Mendel Kaplan comes to mind. "Fundraising is not about giving," he says. "It's about asking." So, there's a lot of asking to do between now and December 31. The campaign is roaring along, but 7,000 contributors still need to be contacted and thousands of Jews in need are waiting for your pledges.

It's birdies, bogies and charity for members of Oakdale Golf & Country Club. Nearly three-quarters of the membership donates to UJA. This year, the Campaign is striving for 90% participation from Oakdale. The club is a special institution for the Jewish community. Its founders, decades ago, were Jewish golfers refused entry to other clubs. Since its inception, Oakdale has nurtured more UJA chairmen than any similar organization. Golf caps off to Elise Kalles, Debbie Kimel, Millard Roth and Paul Rothstein and their above par campaign efforts at Oakdale.

Oakdale Golf & Country Club is a breeding ground for UJA chairmen. Past Chairmen Jerry Shear (L) and Paul Morton (R) are flanked by Paul's daughter Elisa Morton Palter and husband Gil.

When Toronto's rabbis are completely integrated into next year's UJA campaign, it will be a North American first. A delegation of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform religious leaders has agreed to join campaign cabinets as advisers. "An innovative concept for Toronto," is how 1995 campaign co-chair Wendy Eisen described it. "We're trying to strengthen the 'Jewish' in United Jewish Appeal."

Washington's world famous Holocaust Museum now includes a temporary exhibit on Bosnia, which nearly 200 UJA mission members got a chance to see on their recent Fly-In, co-chaired by Avie Bennett and Ira Gluskin.

The day trip also featured briefings at the Jordanian and Israeli embassies.

Ring the bells for Sonia Shron and Shawna Harris who chair the Bialik Hebrew Day School UJA campaign. Their enthusiasm and creativity have inspired increased school activity. This year the Education Division, led by Bernie Shoub and Esther Gold, has established strong roots in every Jewish school.

Mazel tov to tireless workers Gil and Elisa Palter on their latest addition - second child Adam. We're sure he'll be a future member of the UJA family, along with sister Danielle.

Wanna Be A Maccabee? It's a lot easier today than what the Chanuka warriors of old were required to do. UJA's contemporary Maccabees are being asked to step forward for "clean up" telethons starting the last night of Chanuka, December 4. Seven shift captains have already volunteered to help bring Campaign '95 to a successful conclusion: Dodi Weill, Les Aaron, Mark Grenville, Agi Mandel, Barbara Bank, Marlene Axmith and Sonia Shron.

Call the Maccabee volunteer line at (416) 635-2883, ext. 196, to reserve your phone.

BBW pays tribute to cancer fighter

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 200 friends, family and members of B'nai Brith Women turned out to honor Anne Armstrong Gibson as the 38th annual Woman of the Year.

Gibson, 48, is the founder of Wellspring, a support centre for people and their families living with cancer. Since it opened its doors in 1992, over 6,000 people have used its services in addition to a number of health care professionals seeking information on empathetic patient care.

Anne Armstrong Gibson

Diagnosed with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma seven years ago, Gibson went through three years of radiation and chemotherapy before undergoing a bone marrow transplant. Last year her husband died of a stroke, leaving her to tend to two of her own children and six of her husband's from a previous marriage.

Elaine Ender, chair of the Woman of the Year committee, said that while Gibson was an energetic, compassionate and optimistic woman, her experiences "almost destroyed her spirit."

Gibson was aware of the lack of support for patients facing potential terminal illnesses and "felt strongly that no one should endure what she was forced to endure," Ender said.

Ender told the hushed crowd that Gibson began planning Wellspring from her hospital bed, with input from doctors, nurses, psychologists and former cancer patients.

"Anne, you have fought a courageous personal war against a fatal disease and won. You have shown a spirit of true determination," Ender said. "In other words, Anne, you are one truly amazing woman."

In accepting the award Gibson said patient support improves the quality of life and can increase longevity by as much as 26 months.

"Wellspring is a one-of a-kind organization. Much like B'nai Brith Women, it is involved in education and advocacy. Wellspring is facing a deluge of requests to pop up in other cities," she said.

Gibson praised B'nai Brith Women for publicly recognizing the value of volunteerism. "Volunteer forms the essence of humanity. Without it, our society will lose its soul."

Previous recipients of Woman of the Year Award include Gerda Frieberg, Dr. Nehama Baum, Chaviva Hosek, Karen Kain, Genya Intrator, Abby Hoffman, Margaret Laurence and Dr. Betty Stephenson.

Teachers in B.C. learn about Holocaust

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — More than 75 school teachers, representing every school district in British Columbia, attended a program here on teaching the Holocaust, held under auspices of the British Columbia Teachers' Federation (BCTF), in cooperation with the Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC).

Marilyn Berger, associate director of the CJC, arranged for the keynote speaker, Dr. Yehuda Bauer, professor of Holocaust Studies at Hebrew University.

Bronia Sonnenschein, a Holocaust survivor, spoke of her experience in Nazi camps.

A traditional Shabbat dinner hosted by Berger and Zac Kaye, chaplain of Hillel House at the University of British Columbia, was provided by the CJC at the Jewish Community Centre.

Sam Fillipoff, coordinator of Program Against Racism, developed the teaching program for the BCTF. He said it was the first of its kind arranged by his Federation and announced another anti-racist program will be held in the spring.

Berger said CJC will be holding a number of Holocaust symposia in schools throughout the province. In recent years, the annual symposia have been confined to the Vancouver area and cities in the interior of B.C. and the BCTF hope to get Holocaust curriculum developments grants from Multiculturalism B.C., a government agency.

Later in the week, CJC, with the adult education committee of Congregation Beth Israel, sponsored the annual community-wide Kristallnacht commemoration program at the synagogue.

Jewish law considered constant over time

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although different Jewish communities have occasionally amended their laws, the essence of the Jewish legal tradition has basically remained, says a professor of Jewish law at Hebrew University.

"Jewish tradition says that no one is above the law. Even G-d himself is bound by the law," said Prof. Shmuel Shilo.

Shilo was speaking recently at the 14th annual Or Emet lecture at Osgoode Hall, where he is teaching a seminar on Jewish law.

The seminar, established in 1993, allows students to explore Jewish law as a historical and religious system, as well as issues in contemporary Israeli law.

Law school dean Marilyn Pilkington said that while York University has offered Jewish Studies and Jewish Education programs for years, Jewish legal studies have been lacking until now. "This initiative not only demonstrates Osgoode's strong interest in Jewish studies but also our overall commitment to multiculturalism," she said.

Shilo described how the basic word in Jewish law is mitzvah or obligation. "The law, for example obligates families to provide schooling for males so it is a mitzvah for a father to educate his son or grandson, for a teacher to teach and for a family to board a poor scholar. To act out of obligation is completion."

Law of the land

He said Jewish law is similar to modern criminal law in that "the state speaks to a citizen about his behavior and about what is forbidden. What is not forbidden, is permitted."

Shilo said in Israel, legal education is geared to Israeli law, not Jewish law. "Law faculties teach the law of the land. If Jewish law is studied, it is peripheral. There is no prerequisite that judges be knowledgeable about Jewish law."

Journalist rediscovers Hungary's old shuls

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After six years stationed in Europe as a freelance political journalist, the American writer Ruth Ellen Gruber was startled to discover in 1989 that a magnificent old synagogue had been restored in the Hungarian town of Szeged.

"I never had any inkling that such a synagogue could exist outside of a major city," she told an audience of about 80 people recently at a meeting of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, held in conjunction with Holocaust Education Week.

Shortly afterwards, Gruber visited 12 more little-known former synagogues in a three-day trip in Eastern Europe and, on a separate expedition in Poland, saw some 34 synagogues "in varied condition — some were warehouses, some were in ruins....

"That was the beginning of an obsession for me. I had lived in Europe for six years and never knew those places existed. Although Jews had lived in Europe continuously for 1,000 years, the tourist guidebooks talk about palaces and churches but omit references to synagogues."

Gruber's obsession resulted in the publication in 1992 of the well-received guidebook, Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to Central & Eastern Europe. Offering myriad details about sites in Poland, the former Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, the former Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, the book was immediately hailed as the only modern source to focus on places where Jews lived instead of enshrining the places where they died.

As she told her Toronto audience, Gruber has written a second volume, Upon The Doorposts of Thy House, in which she discusses in greater depth some of the former sites of Jewish life in Central and Eastern Europe she found most moving and fascinating.

Ruth Ellen Gruber

The most famous Jewish centre in Central-Eastern Europe, according to Gruber, is Prague and she showed slides of that city's famous Altneushul and old Jewish cemetery, both crowded with tourists. "Downtown Prague is like a Jewish theme park," she said.

"People sell T-shirts and mugs and the most incredible t'shatshkes that you could ever want. I saw some ladies selling pebbles with Stars of David on them — someone called them Jewish pet rocks. They were charging $10 each. In Prague, that's about a day's pay."

Gruber also showed another side of Jewish Prague — a neglected and vandalized cemetery, a synagogue that had been converted into a laundry, another cemetery that had been bulldozed to build a park and television tower.

Upon the Doorposts of Thy House: Jewish Life in East-Central Europe, Yesterday and Today, was recently published by John Wiley & Sons. The hardcover book sells for $34.95 in Canada.

Intimacy seen essential part of Jewish marriage

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Intimacy in the marital relationship is seen as G-dly in Jewish tradition, asserts noted author and lecturer Malka Touger.

Touger was speaking to over 300 women at a program called Women Who Make a Difference, held recently at the Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill. The afternoon was sponsored by N'shei Chabad, the Lubavitch women's organization.

Secular society lurches between the ancient Greco-Roman belief that intimacy and physical pleasure are totally good, and early Christian belief that they are somehow evil.

"Judaism is never confused," Touger said, explaining that "G-d bestowed upon us powerful energies, a gift called intimacy."

G-d, she said, could have brought about conception without sexual relations, but He chose to make us partners with Him in creation.

Even when conception does not take place, a spiritual energy is created that in itself has power.

Intimacy leaves a person breathless and spent, she said, because it "reaches into the very core of our being. And that essence of man is G-dly."

The tradition says, Trouger noted, that when we return from shul on Shabbat, angels accompany us and ask three questions: Are the candles lit (that is, is this a Jewish home in accordance with the laws of Torah)? Is the table set (is the house full of the atmosphere that enhances Halachah)? And are the beds made up, indicating that when men and women, following the laws of Halachah, are intimate, the divine presence, the shechinah, is between them.

Program chair Faygie Itkin (left) presents an award to Shani Bleeman for her work with ECHO, at the Women Who Make a Difference program.

Women, she said, have always recognized that intimacy is holy. In Egypt, when the men separated from their wives in despair at their sad lot, the women went out to the copper mines and made mirrors out of scraps of copper.

These mirrors were used not only to beautify themselves, but to encourage their husbands to regain hope, "so that a proud Jewish nation would leave Egypt, not a broken one."

Later, when Moses made the mishkan, the temporary ark, the women brought these mirrors as their contribution.

"G-d told Moses not to 'take' them [just to be polite], but to accept them, because 'these are more precious to Me than anything.' "

G-d, she said, "was telling Moses and the Jewish people that the holiness and godliness of a Jewish home is not separate from the holiness of a sanctuary. And the intimacy of a Jewish home is holy and sacred."

Honorees of the program were Esther Libman, a physican in family practice; at North York General Hospital emergency department and a lecturer on breast cancer and post-partum depression; and Shelly Botnick and Shani Bleeman, directors of the Canadian chapter of ECHO, an organization that provides a link between the lay and medical comunities, and offers information both on different available treatment options and on the latest medical research.

UJA expecting a large turnout for Yachdav '95

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal is seeking another heavy Toronto turnout for Yachdav, Israel's largest international young leadership convention.

The event, which takes place every three years, is sponsored by Keren Hayesod United Israel Appeal.

The Canadian contingent usually dominates Yachdav. In 1992, over 25 per cent of the 400 delegates were Canadians, and Toronto accounted for 20 of them.

Yachdav 1995 is expecting 500 mission members, according to Keren Hayesod organizer Greg Masel, who was recently in Toronto recruiting participants. The convention will be held between August 2 and 10.

Masel is especially enthusiastic about "the cross-pollination of ideas" with delegates from Japan, Hong Kong and the West Indies.

"It will offer an excellent opportunity to understand how campaigns are conducted in other countries," he added.

Yachdav alumni say the chance to mingle with young adults from distant nations is one of the convention's top attractions.

"We had more in common than I thought we would," said Yachdav 1992 participant Joy Shuchat.

Dr. Norman Epstein, another Yachdav 1992 enthusiast, said "it was important for me to see how much money was being spent on immigrant absorption." Epstein is now programming co-chair for UJA's Young Professional Network.

The peace process is a new dimension to Yachdav '95. The mission will focus strongly on what Masel calls "the changing agenda in the Middle East," reinforced by a two-day trip to Jordan.

North York's 'Bad Boy' mayor gets award from Temple Sinai

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He may have been a Bad Boy in the past, but last Wednesday long-serving North York Mayor Mel Lastman was honored only for his good works.

Lastman, the one-time appliance salesman who recently won a record-breaking 10th mayoral term, was the first recipient of the Temple Sinai Brotherhood Humanitarian of the Year Award.

"I've never been Humanitarian of the Year before," Lastman told The CJN, laughing at the suggestion that he collects such honors like he does election victories.

A seven-member committee unanimously agreed to honor Lastman, said organizer Howard Zippan, because of his dedication to eradicating child abuse, drunk driving, abuse of the elderly and racism in the city.

Mel Lastman

Wife Marilyn and granddaughter Brie joined more than 350 others to give Lastman, 61, a standing ovation and to take part in a fund-raising dinner draw.

Brotherhood president Lew Rasminsky said the yearly event raises upwards of $20,000 to send the synagogue school's confirmation class to Israel and the United States.

There are 23 confirmation students this year.

"There is no greater honor than to be acknowledged by one's own community," Lastman said quietly after accepting the plaque "for his good work in furthering the concept of community in the City of North York."

Kristallnacht's legacy examined

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The legacy of Kristallnacht was the focus of a recent lecture by a University of Toronto religion professor to an overflow B'nai Brith audience.

Prof. Alan Davies, a United Church Minister and author of Anti-Semitism and the Christian Mind, recounted the events of Nov. 9, 1938, when Jewish businesses and synagogues were smashed and burned, and Jews rounded up across Germany.

According to Davies, until Kristallnacht, officials denied to an increasingly sceptical world that Germany was mistreating its Jewish population.

"After the bloodshed and destruction of Kristallnacht, the world finally awoke to the realization of true Nazi intentions," Davies said.

Canadian reaction to Kristallnacht was swift, but confined to the grassroots level, Davies explained. Demonstrations were held across the country: 20,000 people attended one rally alone in Toronto. Letters poured into Prime Minister Mackenzie King's office urging Canada to offer safe haven to Germany's Jews.

The pleas went unanswered, but Davies said Canadians were unified in condemning Germany.

Kristallnacht "confirmed the power of propaganda ... So effectively did the Nazi propaganda machinery utilize the media that even German intelligentsia embraced National Socialist ideology and legitimized anti-Semitism unquestioningly."

Davies said such techniques are a hallmark of all modern totalitarian regimes.

Mideast countries make sacrifices for peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thomas Friedman no longer begins his lectures on the Middle East with the joke about the pious man who prayed to God to let him win the lottery. "Goldberg, give me a chance," goes the punchline. "Buy a ticket."

The joke no longer applies to Arabs and Israelis, Friedman explained during a recent lecture on The Challenge of Peace.

The Pulitzer prize-winning 41-year-old New York Times journalist and author of From Beirut to Jerusalem was in Toronto as the first speaker in the Issues & Insights series run by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University's New Leadership division. About 350 people attended the lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians have now "bought a ticket" and are willing to make sacrifices for peace, said Friedman. "That is the good news. Whether they will reach the final destination...is another question."

Friedman offered three reasons for optimisim and three for pessimism.

On the positive side, he said that the Sept. 13, 1993 handshake between Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat "transformed a conflict that was about rights to a conflict that was about interests. Rights are immutable. Interests invite compromise."

Arafat's recognition of the balance of power between Israel and the PLO is Friedman's second reason for optimism. Friedman likened Arafat to "a guy who was trying to sell a $250,000 home for $3 million. Finally he brought his price down, and that's a big change."

Friedman believes that "the silence with which the vast majority of Israelis and Palestinians have accepted the peace deal" is cause for optimism.

Incidents such as the Tel Aviv bus bombing and the Hebron mosque massacre are a result of "extremists [who] understood that to break through the silence required something so unreasonable, so outrageous that it would unravel this deal."

Hafez al-Assad, president of Syria, tops Friedman's list of reasons for pessimism. "The only hope is if he embraces the Israelis with normalization and peace at the outset," Friedman said.

Arafat's "unstable political structure" is another reason for pessimism, as is the question of Jerusalem and the West Bank, Friedman said.

Thomas Friedman

"You can easily have a divorce with Gaza, but how do you do it in Jerusalem and the West Bank? I don't know."

Friedman's talk also included a cogent outline of the forces which brought Rabin and Arafat to the negotiating table, including the rise of Hamas which "made the PLO look reasonable" and a number of world events including the Gulf War, the end of the Cold War, and the election of Bill Clinton as president of the United States.

Kayla Estrin, co-chair of the Issues & Insights committee, introduced Friedman, and Toby Deverett, her co-chair, thanked him.

The next Issues & Insights lecture will be held at Beth Tzedec on Dec. 11, when Rabbi David Wolpe will discuss How to Talk to Children (and yourself) about God.

Senior Jewish leader set to address UJA campaign

TORONTO — The executive director of North America's most powerful Jewish organization is coming to Toronto for the biggest event of UJA's 1995 campaign.

Malcolm Hoenlein, who heads the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, will be the keynote speaker for UJA's Major Gifts Division on Dec. 6 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

The evening, chaired by Larry Tanenbaum and Ron Frisch, is open to Campaign '95 donors of $10,000 or more. The Major Gifts Division, headed by Michael Bregman and Lorri Kushnir, accounts for half of the campaign total.

The Conference of Presidents represents 50 Jewish organizations. Hoenlein was appointed to his position seven years ago, and in 1992 was elected executive vice-chairman.

He has a master's degree from the University of Pennsylvania, where he taught international relations.

Hoenlein has travelled extensively, meeting with world leaders in Europe, South Africa, the former Soviet Union and the Middle East.

He is considered a conciliator for the diverse ideological factions that comprise North American Jewry.

Family Matters

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Mediation Revisited

Hockey fans in Canada and the United States have had ample cause recently to appreciate the value of mediation.

Indeed, the problems of the hockey "family" are apparently common to most living things. A famous mediator and social worker, Professor Howard Irving, of the University of Toronto, recently recited a disturbing true story. Apparently, some naturalists were observing the rare birth of a condor chick from a safe distance through binoculars. The parents began a physical argument as to who should incubate and nest the egg. The argument became so furious that the parents accidentally kicked the off a mountain ledge. It promptly broke, killing the baby condor.

Unfortunately, divorcing parents display no consideration for their baby condors when they fight over them. They cannot begin to imagine how deeply they hurt their child when she or he witnesses such altercations, whether physical, verbal, or through the court system. One judicial official in the Ontario courts recently told me that children, when they grow up, often go back into the court files and read affidavits prepared several years before in which the parents make horrible allegations against each other and the treatment of the children. No one can begin to understand the pain that such children feel when they are grown. You can then begin to imagine what it must feel like for a child of tender years whose entire world of security rests upon what is supposed to be the foundation of a home.

It is no secret that children of divorced parents who can amicably arrange for visitation and custodial rights have fewer nightmares and are much better adjusted emotionally as they grow older. It is also no longer a secret that children with absentee fathers tend to have greater sexual problems and are by far statistically more inclined to exhibit criminal behaviour, particularly in the case of boys.

Fortunately, most people that become divorced do manage to handle their separation with a fair degree of amicability and without the intervention of lawyers or mediators. However, for the few whose divorces generate serious conflict, in front of the children, both parties should seriously consider mediation rather than spending money on expensive legal assistance, so long as there is no issue of domestic violence. If one of the spouses, usually the woman, is being physically or seriously emotionally abused, then I usually do not advise the parties to go to a mediator unless I am convinced that the mediator can "empower" the wife and allow the negotiations to take place on an "even playing field". This is virtually impossible in most cases. However, in many situations, particularly where violence or serious emotional abuse is not an issue, mediation is the best way to save children from the agony of watching their parents destroy each other.

Mediation is also useful in solving family, including sibling rivalries, that take place when siblings or other family members fight over the proceeds of an Estate. Often these disputes are not really over money, but over some underlying anger caused by parental favouritism exhibited during someone's childhood. I have been involved in several cases in which brothers and sisters spent a great deal of money fighting each other over money. However, through mediation, they realized that what they were really fighting over was that extra wink that Dad gave his "favourite" daughter or the special attention that Mom gave her "favourite" son, to the severe emotional detriment of the other children.

Parents beware. Ensure that you treat your children with the same love and affection because "Hell hath no Fury like a Child scorned".

Having now interested you in the virtues of mediation, I must unfortunately tell you that there are at least a few mediators in the market who are "quacks". The industry is not regulated in most provinces. There is an association of mediators that has standards and issues certificates based on a regulated number of hours in the practice and courses "in the field". These courses are taken by lawyers, social workers, and other mental health professionals. However, many so-called mediators have no training and can often make matters worse by appearing to take sides in the dispute rather than involving the parties in a process that leads to positive behavioral changes, kindness and "Menschlichkeit".

Some people also have the illusion that they can go to one single lawyer and have an agreement drafted after the lawyer helps them come to an arrangement that is satisfactory to them and the other party or parties involved. Given the state of Canadian law, once the parties have reached such an agreement, they must still go to their own lawyers to obtain independent legal advice and obtain a certificate reflecting such advice before the agreement would be considered truly valid. Although the cost of these two lawyers would be considerably less than a "mediator" lawyer, the parties will still be paying for the assistance of three counselors rather than the one individual. However, if the three lawyers are "conciliatory" in nature, the exercise will have been well worth it. In many cases, such mediation could save the couple and their children a great deal of money and months or years of aggravation, litigation or negotiation.

Alternatively, parents can seek a social worker or psychologist mediator, particularly if there are no financial issues to be resolved, but should still see their own lawyer before signing a formal separation agreement.

Harry Rasky's new film to premiere on Dec. 1

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Can the end of the world be stopped, is one question asked by Harry Rasky in his latest documentary, Prophecy.

The Canadian premiere of Prophecy, partially filmed in Jerusalem, takes place at the Ontario Science Centre Dec. 1 at 7:30 p.m. The preview is hosted by the Jerusalem Foundation of Toronto.

The film has been described as "visually stunning" and is a candidate for an Academy nomination.

Paul Slavens, president of the Jerusalem Foundation, said proceeds from the preview showing will help fund a natural amphitheatre in the Hinnom Valley as part of the Jerusalem Youth Music Centre, a coexistence project that serves more than 400 Jewish, Christian and Arab youth.

The Jerusalem Foundation was created 25 years ago by then mayor Teddy Kollek to raise the quality of life for all the city's residents. Its projects include education, culture, community services, beautification and preservation of Jerusalem's historical and religious sites.

Rasky told The CJN he selected the Jerusalem Foundation for the Canadian premiere "because I love Teddy Kollek and he's been involved in a few of my major, major films like, Next Year in Jerusalem and Homage to Chagall: The Colours of Love. I think he is one of the great men of the world."

Rasky, who has created 40 feature-length films for the CBC, will introduce his film and speak about unusual incidents surrounding its making.

The film explores the history, nature and role of prophecy in Judaism, Christianity, Islam and other major world religions. There are provocative interviews with philosopher Emil Fackenheim, former Soviet dissident Natan Sharansky, the Dalai Lama, Nobel scientist James Watson, Prof. John Kenneth Galbraith, sculptor and Holocaust survivor Ernest Raab, aboriginal Indian spiritual leader David Courchesne, and the wise, grandfatherly survivor of Japanese internment on the River Kwai, the late Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum.

Rasky said he has dedicated the film to Rabbi Nussbaum's memory "because I was inspired by the spirit of Rabbi Nussbaum and thought it would be a proper dedication."

For tickets or for more information, call the Jerusalem Foundation, (416) 484-6132, fax (416) 489-0036, or write to 124 Eglinton Ave. W., Suite 220, Toronto, Ont., M4R 2G8.

Territorial compromise essential for peace: Beilin

He likened Israel to a sick person who has become accustomed to using a wheelchair and still reaches for it even after surgery makes it unnecessary.

At a morning meeting with Grade 11 and 12 students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Beilin cited the example of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin who "was courageous enough to decide that it was worthwhile to give a huge part of the land rather than risk another war" when he made peace with Egypt in 1979.

"It's not very convenient to make peace with enemies, but that's the way of the world. If you make peace, it's with enemies," he told the students. "We have no other partners."

Beilin sparked controversy in Israel in October by raising the possibility of Israeli talks with less extremist elements within Hamas.

"There were those who said it would be a mistake to encourage them this way," Beilin told The CJN during a brief interview between appointments. "The question is, what is in the interest of Israel? The interest of Israel now is not to exclude such a possibility. It doesn't seem [likely] that something like that would happen, but we should not close the door."

"We have to act against [Hamas] directly and to continue the pressure on [PLO chairman Yasser] Arafat," said Beilin at a press conference, adding that "if there is a change and they are ready to denounce terrorism, we shouldn't make the mistake of saying we'll never talk to Hamas."

For someone known for controversial remarks, the youthful-looking, 47-year-old politician is surprisingly soft-spoken. During his visit to CHAT, he spent almost as much time listening to students as he did talking to them.

The visit, arranged through the Israeli consulate, was sandwiched between the press conference and the BB luncheon at which Beilin was keynote speaker. Earlier, he fielded with aplomb a series of heated questions on the peace process at a well-attended breakfast sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress.

"This is quite a rare opportunity for me," said Beilin of his visit to CHAT. Upon learning that most of the 250 students had visited Israel, Beilin wanted to know, "Was it a significant event? Were there negative ramifications, or only positive ones? Did you have a chance to meet people your own age?"

Earlier this year, Beilin proposed a plan for every young Diaspora Jew to visit Israel at the age of 17 in an effort to reverse increasing assimilation in the Diaspora, particularly in the United States.

"This idea is very expensive," Beilin told The CJN. He had suggested financing the plan using money from Israel's welfare system, which is funded partly by United Jewish Appeal and United Israel Appeal. "That was the controversy."

In fact, that was only part of the controversy. Beilin is quick to admit that his plan to establish Bet Yisrael, a "democratically elected world Jewish organization [to] eventually replace both the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency" was not met with universal enthusiasm.

Beilin says the WZO and the Jewish Agency are "not democratic." Although the two agencies claim to share his goal of bringing more young people to Israel, Beilin maintains that their record doesn't reflect that.

"Talking is one thing, but bringing them is another." He added that current statistics (10,000 young people visiting Israel annually) do not correspond to the population of that age group in the Diaspora community (100,000).

Beilin claims his views on this issue have been not only misunderstood but distorted.

"Speaking about democratization meant the changing of the current establishment, and it is more than natural that [Jewish community leaders] wouldn't like that so much. The need to use Israel in order to collect money both for the federations and for Israel is indispensable in their eyes, and they were afraid that once we collect money for education, for immigration to Israel and for visits to Israel rather than to the welfare system in Israel, it will be much more difficult to collect the money."

Free trade expected to boost business with competitors from the United States, the European Union and the European Free Trade Association, because of their free trade agreements with Israel.

For instance, during a 1990-91 housing boom in Israel, Canadian manufacturers of prefabricated homes, unlike their U.S. and European competitors, faced a 10 per cent Israeli duty on their products.

Canadian businesses solved the problem by finding American and European products to sell to Israel, effectively stealing jobs from Canadian builders.

Other companies take advantage of the U.S.-Israel free trade agreement by sending semi-finished products to American subsidiaries to be completed before being shipped, duty-free, to Israel.

For example, Ottawa's booming Newbridge Networks, which manufacturers telecommunications equipment, sends semi-finished goods to the United States to be finished and sold as American products.

According to the Israel Economic Mission to Canada, when products travel south, so do jobs.

Under a Canada-Israel free trade agreement, Canadian products could be completely built in Canada, benefiting Canadian workers and the economy.

Since the United States signed a free trade agreement with Israel in 1985, Israeli imports from the U.S. have more than doubled. Last year, Israel imported more than $4 billion worth of goods from the United States, Rabin said. And Canada, responded Chretien, would like a share of that trade.

"Although Israel has a population of only five million," said David Goldstein, president of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, "it is oriented to international trade... Besides the volume of trade, Israel has a sophisticated, modern market, with a Western infrastructure, where Canadians can relatively easily do business."

Canada and Israel currently fund a joint industrial research and development program. The Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development fund was established last June. Each country has agreed to contribute $3 million over three years to fund private sector industrial research.

Lifeline for the Old aids Israel's elderly, disabled

BY CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For more than 30 years, Yad Lakashis — Lifeline for the Old — in Jerusalem has provided a place for the elderly and people with disabilities to work and socialize.

Nava Ein-Mor, the general director of Lifeline, was in Toronto recently, where she told the board meeting of the Canadian Friends of Lifeline about the accomplishments of the group and the challenges facing them.

Myriam Mendilow, the founder of Lifeline, visited Toronto several times with a plea to help restore the dignity and independence of the elderly in Jerusalem.

Mendilow was an English and French teacher in Israel. Seeing beggars with no hope, she resigned from her teaching position and, with the help of friends and the Israeli government, she located and renovated an abandoned building in Musrara, the poorest neighborhood in Jerusalem, and founded a workshop and centre for Jews, Christians and Muslims.

Beginning with bookbinding for the city schools, the program grew and workshops opened, producing jewelry, weaving, knitting, and doing metalwork, ceramics, picture framing and other crafts.

The workers are paid a small sum for their crafts, which are sold to raise funds for the workers themselves and for other social services. Mendilow died in 1989.

Today, Ein-Mor said, there are 10 workshops, eight handicraft workshops and two box-making and book binding facilities. As well, there is a thrift shop, a dental clinic, carpentry shop, medical facility, shoemaker and other counselling and support services.

Of the more than 250 current participants in Lifeline, she said, one-half are newcomers from the former Soviet Union.

"We have a great mix and integration of veteran Israelis and olim," Ein-Mor said, "and we now have an ulpan run by volunteers." Many of the programs are intergenerational.

At Lifeline, all participants are part of a team. Many people who work at Lifeline say they have been revitalized. "It has given them something to live for and to look forward to each day," she said.

Ein-Mor told The CJN, "Lifeline has many facets — we not only extend our services to 250 needy and disabled Jerusalemites, but parallel and more importantly we act as an educating agent in our society for the sake of changing attitudes towards the elderly."

She cited as an example Lifeline's practice of hosting visits from people who "interact with the elderly workers to expose the [visitors] to the ongoing atmosphere — a tangible feeling of independence, self-respect and dignity that is prevalent" among those in the program.

Beth David's spiritual leader, Rabbi Philip Scheim, a longtime supporter of Lifeline, has spearheaded the Canadian group.

At the board meeting, held at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, Harold Cohen was elected president.

CJF plans campus service

TORONTO — Jewish Canadians were asked to come up with the "ultimate" national campus service at a recent conference organized by the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) campus service committee.

The Oct. 28-30 conference, held in King City north of Toronto, was attended by 50 students and community leaders from across the country.

Participants came from Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Toronto, London, Windsor, Ottawa, Hamilton, Montreal and Halifax.

Students Doron Goldstein, Michael Heitner, Charlotte Kaiser, Michael Rackover and Evan Savelson said they felt that limited funds, lack of communication between campuses and an image problem suffered by Jewish student organizations prevented the development of a national Jewish student service.

Consensus was reached on a regional system in which Vancouver, Torono and Montreal would act as program centres. Student input was prioritized, and cost-sharing agreed upon.

The proposals will be put before the CJF in June, and organizers hope the system will be in place by fall 1995.

CJC meets with Marchi

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewry is tired of the "bureaucratic runaround" it has experienced in its desire to see Nazi war criminals brought to justice, Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi was told recently.

For the past 15 years, the Department of Justice has been the source of the runaround, but now that cases have been transferred to Immigration, the Jewish community expects legal action to commence in the near future, said Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Congress spokesmen, along with representatives of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, met with Marchi last week in Toronto. The meeting was requested by Congress to discuss a variety of issues, including Nazi war criminals, hate promotion and immigration matters.

Abella told the minister Congress was aware that at least eight files had been transferred to him from the Justice Department's war crimes unit. That put the pressure squarely on Immigration's shoulders.

In the seven years it has existed, the war crimes unit enjoyed only one success, when it stripped Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens of his citizenship and deported him to his native Holland, where he was jailed. Congress and other Jewish lobbyists have been urging the unit to transfer its focus from criminal charges to denaturalization procedures to bring war criminals to justice.

In other matters, Congress pointed to the arrival in recent months of American white supremacist rock groups who perform in Canada. These groups should be stopped at the border, Congress said.

Marchi replied that due to budget cuts, the Immigration Department does not have the people available to monitor the bands and keep them from entering Canada, Abella said.

Congress also raised the issue of the high rate of acceptance of Jewish refugee claimants from Israel (see story page 40), as well as the discrepancy in acceptance rates between the IRB's Toronto and Montreal offices. That discrepancy undermines the credibility of the tribunal, Abella said.

The Toronto Board of Jewish Education extends its deepest sympathies to the entire family of the late
ISRAEL KOSCHITZKY ז"ל who passed away recently in Jerusalem.

His unique personality, his devotion of Torah and Jewish learning, and his deep commitment to the people and the land of Israel were an inspiration to all who knew him.

May you be comforted in your grief.

Pulver participates in hockey talks

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Ian Pulver

TORONTO — Back when there was still hope the National Hockey League season would start on time, Ian Pulver was racking up more air miles than a member of the Vancouver Canucks.

Fly in to Calgary on Sunday, down to Anaheim and L.A. on Monday, up to Vancouver on Tuesday, over to Calgary on Wednesday, south to Las Vegas on Thursday and then board the red eye for the long flight back to Toronto.

For one month of pre-season hockey in September, Pulver flew from city to city to brief the members of the National Hockey League Players' Association (NHLPA) about the issues separating the players and owners.

As associate counsel of the NHLPA, Pulver has been deeply immersed in the meetings, briefings and negotiations that have served as a poor substitute to on-ice action for the hockey-starved fan.

Along with NHLPA executive-director Bob Goodenow and several U.S.-based lawyers who serve as outside counsel, he has sat across the negotiating table from NHL Commissioner Gary Bettman and the owners' bargaining team.

Much of his time is spent "involved in collective bargaining negotiations, as well as interacting with the players. I'm constantly on the phone with the players, educating them on a daily basis.

"So long as the players are educated, they understand the process and strategy behind the negotiating process and the reasons why there is not a deal done. [Then] they are better able to handle being locked out by the owners."

Negotiations have been tough and Bettman has taken a hard line with the players, Pulver said. But he discounts suggestions that Bettman has been the target of thinly-veiled anti-Semitism.

"I think the tack he's taken by attacking the players, by denying them their [collective] rights (to travel expenses, etc.) is unacceptable." But as to the critique of Bettman, "I don't think it's racist."

At only 29, Pulver has spent his past four years at the NHLPA virtually living a dream. "Growing up in my family, sports, specifically hockey, was an area that was heavily emphasized," he said.

His father, Dr. Frank Pulver, is a longstanding season-ticket holder at the Gardens and Ian recalls spending almost every Saturday and Wednesday watching the Leafs.

His own hockey career is typically Canadian. He skated in the Metro Toronto Hockey League and in the Forest Hill House League. He played intramural hockey while studying law at the University of British Columbia.

While at UBC, Pulver enrolled in a sports law course on labor law, contract law and salary arbitration. He wrote a paper on the NHL and the legal issues facing it. One of those he sent the paper to was Goodenow, at that time the newly-appointed head of the NHLPA. He met Goodenow at the 1990 entry draft in Vancouver and the rest, as they say, is history.

Despite the long hours and the draining travel schedule, Pulver is more than happy with his lot. "To me, if I couldn't play in the NHL, I have the next best job I could ever want, interacting with the players and dealing with the issues that come across my desk on a daily basis."

Orthodox novelist tells a tale

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Bestselling Orthodox novelist Naomi Ragen paraphrased the words of economist John Kenneth Galbraith to tell a Toronto audience recently that "the reason I write is to comfort the afflicted and to afflict the comfortable."

Speaking at the Jewish Book Fair, the three-time novelist defended herself against criticism that she was maligning the Orthodox community and washing its dirty laundry in public.

"If you read all my books, you'll see they are a complete picture and they are completely balanced," said the Brooklyn-born Ragen, who moved to Israel 28 years ago.

Ragen's latest book, The Sacrifice of Tamar, chronicles the events that befall an Orthodox woman in Israel who gives birth to a black baby. Accused of adultery, the woman maintains her innocence. Eventually, the baby's grandmother admits she was raped 25 years earlier in Brooklyn.

Like the earlier Jephte's Daughter and Sotah, Ragen's newest literary creation portrays ultra-Orthodox Jewish characters without halos or pedestals. The events in her books are based on actual occurrences, she said. "It's all fact, none of it is fiction."

Ragen read from a letter from a Jewish reader saying that anyone who read her books "would have to conclude that the frum world is sick and degenerate." Then she read part of a letter from a gentile reader, thanking her for illuminating "so many positive things" within Jewish culture for her.

"I've been asked by Orthodox rabbis on this publicity tour to address their congregations," Ragen told The CJN. "One rabbi said, 'This woman has tremendous courage — we thank her for bringing these things to light.' "

KEEPING TRADITION

This award-winning portrait of the Sabbath, titled Keeping Tradition, was taken by Halifax photographer Jonathan Amiel Mendleson, 22. Mendleson, currently studying photography at Nova Scotia Community College, spent nine hours perfecting the shot "after I woke up one morning with a vision." That vision, explained the 1990 March of the Living participant, is "one part of my Jewish activism;" Mendelson is also president of his local Jewish students' group. Keeping Tradition was judged amongst the best entries in a recent student photography contest sponsored by Photo Life magazine and Kodak Canada.

Assimilation helped Italian Jews survive

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Most of the Italian Jewish community — approximately 38,000 out of 45,000 — survived the Holocaust because Italy did not have a strong anti-Semitic tradition, an expert in modern Italian history told an audience during the recent Holocaust Education Week.

About 150 people turned up at the Columbus Centre for Susan Zuccotti's lecture on Italians and the Holocaust.

Zuccotti, a history professor from Columbia University, wrote a 1987 book on the subject, The Italians and the Holocaust. Her latest book, The Holocaust, the French, and the Jews, came out last year.

Zuccotti said the high level of assimilation of Italian Jews into greater Italian society helped them survive. They knew the language, had friends and so could hide or pass themselves off as Italians. She also said because the Italians hated the Germans, few Italians betrayed those Jews in hiding and many went out of their way to protect them.

Atlantic leaders visit Israel

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Ivan Levine had never been to Israel. But on his return from a United Way Appeal mission in October, the Fredericton businessman termed his trip "the most profound experience with travel and learning I have ever had in my life."

Levine was a member of a 16-person group of Atlantic Canadian Jewish community leaders on a trip planned "to have people see for themselves what Israel is doing and return home with a renewed commitment," said Victor Goldberg, Halifax UIA chair.

"You could see the pride of our people when they were there and this will help in rebuilding our own communities."

Levine, chair and past-president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said he found things in Israel for which he was totally unprepared. "It is now up to us to explain to others the message, the feelings, the sensations of what is happening, where Israel has come from and where it is going and what is needed from the people of the Diaspora."

At a UIA luncheon held as part of the biennial AJC conference, two members of the mission were presented Lion of Judah pins for their donations.

Barbara Newman established the Barbara and Norman Newman Scholarship Fund in the Upper Galilee.

"This was my first trip to Israel," Newman told the luncheon guests, "and it was outstanding in every respect. I learned about the country and I learned about myself. I am pleased to give the scholarship in my late husband's name."

Madame Justice Constance Glube, chief justice of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, established a home environment centre in Or Yehuda, a community supported by Atlantic Canadians.

Lois Levine, who accompanied her husband, Ivan, on the mission, said, "Before we went, we were committed to Israel. At the end of the mission, we shared our experiences in a debriefing and were asked to share our experiences with those at home. Now there is a passion to tell the story."

While the mission was in Israel, there was a hostage-taking, the Tel Aviv bus bombing "only a few hours after we were in that area," said Ivan Levine, and the ongoing peace discussions.

Dealing with Gaucher disease

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Next to 'I do,' the two words which have most affected Judy Jacob's life are Gaucher disease.

Jacob's husband, Mark Freedman, was diagnosed with the inherited genetic disorder 15 years ago. Since then the couple have founded the National Gaucher Foundation of Canada, a charitable foundation, and are lobbying for funding of a treatment drug.

At a recent Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Brotherhood breakfast meeting, Jacobs explained that Gaucher hinders the body's ability to produce the enzyme needed to break down certain fat substances in the body's cells. Without the enzyme, these fat-laden cells collect the spleen, liver, heart and lungs and impede normal functioning. Symptoms include anemia, bruising, fatigue, nosebleeds and weakened and brittle bones which cause pain and fractures.

Gaucher is most common in Jews of Eastern European descent, but Jacobs said she becomes concerned when a disease is labelled as part of a particular ethnic group. "I know of non-Jewish parents who have two children with Gaucher disease and they later found out that the grandparents were of Jewish background.

"We get into a closed box when we think of a disease as being Jewish. We may not pass religion onto our children but we definitely pass our genes and there is a large gene pool out there."

She told the group of a project she named Matchmaker-Matchbreaker, spearheaded by a New York chassidic rabbi to prevent Jewish genetic diseases like Tay Sachs from being passed on. Data screened from 17-year-old girls and 18-year-old boys is put into a computer, "and when a couple gets together, each person can call a hotline, reveal a confidential number and the computer will tell them if a match is [genetically] compatible."

Until recently, people with Gaucher disease had few treatment options. A drug, Ceredase, has been developed to replace the deficient enzyme. Patients can receive funding for the drug under government health plans if they meet certain criteria.

Gaucher disease is one of the first genetic diseases to be successfully treated with enzyme replacement therapy.

Jacobs said the 3-year-old National Gaucher Foundation of Canada was founded to educate the medical community and the public about Gaucher disease, raise funds to develop a cure and reach out to Gaucher patients and their families.

Jacobs said she knows of 29 people in Canada with the disease, "but that number is not representative of all cases. Not everyone wants to come forward."

For information on the Gaucher Foundation of Canada, call 486-4338.

Reena Leisure Retreat reopens for disabled

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two recent York University graduates are the dynamic duo behind Caledon Hills Leisure Village, operators of the newly reopened Reena Leisure Retreat and Conference Centre at Caledon Hills, Ont.

Mark Blank, 22, and Jack Ohayon, 23, worked with the Reena Foundation to reopen the centre, located 65 km north of Toronto.

"Caledon Hills provides a hassle-free weekday or weekend retreat," Blank said.

Sol Fleising, financial administrator for the Reena Foundation, said the foundation will derive rental income from the centre.

Reena is a non-profit agency providing services for the handicapped. The Caledon Hills centre will be available to the handicapped community, Fleising said.

For now, youth groups, synagogues, schools, clubs, corporations, bar and bat mitzvah parties and private rentals have been using the facility. It can accomodate between 25 and 150 people.

The Reena Foundation has added two new conference rooms to the facility, painted and heated the winterized cabins and hired an on-site, full-time maintenance man.

Built on a man-made lake, the Leisure Centre offers indoor and outdoor activities like baseball, football, a gymnasium, billiards and ping pong tables, nature trails, an amphitheatre and board games.

"We realize the need for people of all ages to experience a weekday or weekend escape from the hectic and stressed city," Blank said. "We also realize the need to keep a group entertained throughout their stay."

Both Blank and Ohayon have worked at Camp Reena. Ohayon also operates a 5-year-old catering company under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto.

Events like murder mystery nights, bingo or a disc jockey can be planned for the retreat on request.

Cabins are equipped with washrooms, showers and a covered patio. The kosher kitchen prepares all the baked goods and there is a wide choice of menu options, including vegetarian. The facility also offers a 24-hour beverage table and a daily snack.

Fleising said Reena clients will use the camping facilities over the summer. "We are very pleased with the job Mark and Jack are doing and we intend to use their catering facilities in the city as well as at Caledon Hills."

Kollel Esh Dat marks 21st birthday

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Colorful purple and red balloons, streamers and stars, and a huge blue and white cake combined with an enthusiastic crowd of some 300 at Beth Jacob Synagogue recently to mark the 21st birthday celebration of Kollel Esh Dat.

Kollel Esh Dat is an institute of higher Torah learning in Tel Aviv. Students and staff are also involved in publishing the works of its founder, the Ozerover Rav, Rabbi Moshe Yechiel HaLevi Epstein.

Guest speaker Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation and president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, praised the Kollel supporters, many of whom are Holocaust survivors, for rebuilding the Torah world out of the ashes of the Holocaust.

Rabbi Stern sounded a warning about the decline in moral standards in North American society, referring especially to the increasing acceptance of abortion and euthanasia.

In 1933, he said, Germany passed a law against cruelty to animals. A few days after Kristallnacht, firemen were forbidden to go to the aid of a Jewish home on fire.

"When there is no fear of G-d, no understanding of ultimate moral truths, Jewish homes will burn," he warned. "Laws don't mean anything."

The rabbi, known for his right-wing political views about Israel, concluded by calling for peace in Israel — "a true peace, built not by carving up the country, but within proper borders."

The 21 candles on the cake were lit by former dinner honorees.

Most of the Orthodox rabbinate were at the dinner.

York Centre Liberals to vote

RICHMOND HILL — The York Centre Provincial Liberal Association is assuring observant Jews that they will be able to vote for a candidate to replace retiring MPP Greg Sorbara, despite the fact that voting takes place on a Saturday.

Voting by preferential ballot — which eliminates the need for more than one ballot — takes place Dec. 10 at Richmond Green, 1300 Elgin Mills Rd., Richmond Hill, from 3 p.m. to 7 p.m.

The Sabbath ends at roughly 5:30 that day, leaving 1½ hours for shomer Shabbat Jews to cast votes.

Sorbara, long a visible presence on the Jewish scene, announced earlier this year that he would not seek re-election in the next provincial election.

In the running to replace him are Steve Budaci, Sorbara's former executive assistant; Mario Ferri, the executive director of a Scarborough community centre and an activist in the anti-dump group Vaughan Cares; Aldo Tollis, a Woodbridge lawyer; and City of Vaughan councillor Mario Racco.

Sam Faivish of Toronto (centre) joined (from left) Antony Barczak, 77, Teresa Brabowska and Bronislaw Lasota, 82, for the awarding of Righteous Among the Nations status on the Polish Christians, and posthumously, on three deceased members of the family. Confering the honor in Warsaw was Israel's ambassador to Poland, Gershon Zohar.

Toronto Jew returns to Poland to reunite with Christian 'angels'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sam Faivish's long journey has come full circle.

Recently, Faivish, a Downsview, Ont. resident, returned to his native Poland to witness the closing chapter of his wartime experiences: the awarding of Righteous Among the Nations status to members of the Christian family who rescued him from death.

The Barczak family received the honor accorded to just 10,000 other righteous Gentiles around the world, for having hidden Faivish and two other young men in their barn in the Polish countryside.

The award is bestowed by Yad Vashem after years of evidence gathering, and was awarded by Israel's ambassador to Poland, Gershon Zohar.

"What can I say?" asked Faivish, now 83 and retired from a variety of business ventures. "They were angels sent from Heaven."

Faivish lived in the Jewish ghetto of Belchatow, in the wartime Polish Protectorate. In 1944, the Nazis shipped him to a work camp in Pietrokov, from which he and two friends — brothers Meyer and Yechezkiel Brightburg — escaped.

The three ran from barn to barn, begging for refuge but found none until they arrived at the Barczaks, who hid them for six months until liberation by Russian troops in February 1945.

Despite the meagre war rations of the day, the Christian family of four brothers, a sister and a niece shared food and clothing with the three escapees and braved the dangers of sheltering Jews in a region crawling with Nazi soldiers.

Following the war, Faivish returned to Belchatow, only to discover he was the only member of his family of seven siblings and parents to have survived the war.

He married in 1948. A daughter was born in the Bergen-Belsen transit camp. In 1952, the Faivishes came to Canada and lost contact with their Polish saviors until their son Jerry found them in 1970, while he was backpacking through Europe.

Sam Faivish began sending the Barczaks money, and six years ago he went to Poland to reconnect. Then he began the long process of having the family recognized as Righteous, something that requires final approval from an Israeli judge.

Over the summer, Faivish flew to the Czech Republic and drove 11 hours to Warsaw to witness the presentation.

Today, he has eight grandchildren, he proudly notes — a testament to the courage of one family.

EHUD SAVION

Israel Aliyah Centre

'The business of helping people make aliyah'

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What do four rabbis, one drug rehabilitation specialist and a family practice doctor have in common?

They've all made aliyah with their families.

These six join the 380 Canadian families who made aliyah this year.

Ehud Savion, regional director of the Israel Aliyah Center in Toronto, says his business — the business of helping people make aliyah — has increased 60 per cent in the last two years.

In Canada's post-recessionary times, few establishments can claim such a success rate. "There are three main reasons [why people make aliyah]," Savion said, during a recent interview in his unassuming office on Bathurst Street.

"First, there is the ideological point of view. Here, we are talking about more religious Jews — traditional and Orthodox. This group makes up about 40 per cent of the total aliyah figure."

The second motivator is societal. Of the 212 people who made aliyah from Toronto, 30 to 40 were students. Savion said younger people crave the fast-paced lifestyle and the warmth of the country. "The night life [in Tel Aviv] is 24 hours."

Savion attributes the sluggish albeit recovering Canadian economy as the third motivator that has helped families decide to make aliyah. "There is big growth in the economy in Israel," he said.

Big growth may in fact be minimizing the continuing 'economic spurt' in Israel.

Israel's unemployment rate dropped from 12 per cent in 1993 to under 8 per cent this year. Foreign investments are on the rise, and exports have increased.

All these factors translate into a five per cent growth rate since 1989.

A report, published this September, by Israel's Bank Leumi, predicts the growth trend of Israel's GDP will continue at a robust rate of 5 per cent per annum.

The time is right and the Israeli economy is ripe for those considering aliyah to delve further.

The Israeli Ministry of Immigration & Absorption states that between 1989 to 1994, over 600,000 Jews were absorbed.

So what makes a successful aliyah?

According to Savion, a good job that is challenging and well-liked, housing, a high level of education, and social integration.

The centre provides several packages to help Canadian Jews ease into their new life.

There is also the job development program, financed through UIA Canada and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, which helps immigrants find employment prior to arriving in Israel. This program operates with an 85 per cent success rate, according to the centre. [See page 36 for further information about the program.]

Funds for olim are available as loans or grants to pay for airline tickets. Household items are allowed into the country duty-free.

Once in Israel, the government provides six months of free Hebrew schooling and a learning allowance on which to live. Families have five years of rent subsidies and a competitive mortgage — 1/4 of the mortgage is a gift if the family resided in Israel for at least 15 years.

Olim are automatically qualified for unemployment insurance and all benefit from the 3½ years of reduced income tax payments.

A generous incentive program to say the least.

That North American immigrants have the right to retain their foreign currency accounts for 30 years, that students are granted three years free university tuition and olim can purchase a tax-free vehicle — perks for which Israelis do not qualify — may cause animosity amongst Israelis.

Savion, whose own son can't get into an Israeli university because they are full, is philosophical about these potential drawbacks.

"Everything is focused on helping people become absorbed. We need the population. It is better if they come — even if they have nothing — because it will pay off in the long run."

Despite this, making aliyah seems almost trouble-free.

Almost.

Savion doesn't hedge. As a former Israeli naval commander, a position he held for 25 years, Savion is used to dealing with things head-on.

"Compared to North America, there is a significant drop in salaries and benefits," he said.

A hospital administrator or professor who earns between $300,000 and $400,000 a year in Canada can expect to make $100,000 to $150,000 in Israel.

"Almost half," he said, pointing out that Israel's lower standard of living means someone could live nicely on $150,000.

Tied to this is the fact that it's hard to make a living and socialize if one doesn't speak the language.

"Language is a problem and not a problem." Savion said. "The overall issue is that there are many international companies investing in Israel. We [Israelis] are an imitation society so many business managers want to run to their offices like here [Canada]."

With hints of a free trade deal pending, investment and trade between the two countries can only rise.

According to the November issue of Link, an Israeli magazine that focuses on business and technology, trade between Canada and Israel has grown by 20 per cent in the last four years.

From $129 million in 1990, Israeli exports to Canada reached $155 million in 1993 and Canadian exports have grown by a similar amount.

The private health care system is another disadvantage that bears consideration. The health bill to be activated Jan. 1, 1995 is designed to provide free health care for everyone.

However, if Israel assumes an open health care policy along with the Law of Return, and if internal conflict in Canada interferes with the operation of the health care system, terminally ill Jews will flock to Israel. Israel will accept them but who will pay for it?

Savion says exceptions will need to be written into the bill for olim with a pre-existing terminal disease.

To raise the profile of the centre within Canada, Savion, with the help of Jewish organizations, have initiated several programs.

The first will outline hi-tech employment opportunities in Israel with a job fair. If the 60-odd resumes Savion has already received is any indication, the event will be successful.

The November/December issue of acumen reports that Newbridge and Pratt and Whitney Canada have jumped on the Israeli hi-tech economic growth wagon early. Over the past five years, Israel has averaged nearly a 5 per cent growth with the hi-tech, non-military sector. Jobs have grown with this GNP stimulas.

"For Orthodox families, we have introduced a unique integration package. We find them a job and offer them a Canadian-built home [built by the Canadian Construction Company] in a religious setting.

"We have also arranged a student group — with a core number of six — to arrange a group for aliyah," Savion said, noting that a pilot trip is planned for next summer.

"We have planned activities around what life is like in Israel and hopefully, by the time we're finished, we'll have about 30 participants."

Firm expands to Canada through local company

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The Alliance NETWORK

TORONTO — Silicom Connectivity Solutions, a company that makes adaptors to link laptop computers, is another rising star on Israel's high tech scene.

Last year the Ra'anana-based company established a U.S. subsidiary in Redmond, Washington, or Silicon Valley North, the home of Microsoft and other high tech firms.

In October, Silicom signed an agreement with a Canadian distributor, Alliance Network. "It's the beginning of our expansion in the Canadian market," said Gideon Grundland, the company's Canadian representative.

One of Silicom's newest products, a card called the Ethernet PCMCIA adaptor, neatly fits into the slots of the latest laptop models and greatly increases the speed at which information on networked computers can be processed. The adaptor outperforms, and costs about 30 per cent less, than similar products made by other companies.

"All notebooks will work with that adaptor," said Grundland.

Recently Silicom announced the introduction of a PCMCIA card that combines Ethernet and memory, for use with sub notebooks, or palm tops. The company is developing a version that will include a fax/modem.

Silicom, founded in 1987, began making adaptors for portables in 1992, at a time when sales were starting to climb and few machines were networked.

The marketing research firm International Data Corporation (IDC) reported that of the eight million laptops sold worldwide in 1993, only 12.6 per cent of them became part of networks.

IDC predicts that sales of portables will reach 13.5 million in 1994. Sales of laptops, said Grundland, are growing at a faster rate than sales of desktop models.

He attributed the popularity of laptops to recent improvements made by manufacturers — screens, for example, are larger and brighter — and to their compact size.

"They have all the features a regular desktop has and they take less space," he said.

Silicom has grown rapidly since it entered the portable computer market in 1992. Revenues for that year were $1 million dollars; about $1.3 million in 1993; and in the first nine months of this year, sales topped $2 million.

The company made its first public share offering in 1994, adding its name to the growing list of Israeli high tech companies on New York's NASDAQ.

This week The CJN features...Open Window Bakery

By LORI DENNIS

TORONTO — In an era where most industries rely on hi-tech equipment to get the job done, there are still businesses that strive to maintain old-world traditions.

Walk into the original Open Window Bakery at Bathurst and Wilson — or several other Open Window stores for that matter — and you can watch bakers putting egg wash and seeds on their challahs by hand.

At the Open Window factory, large twister bagels are formed by hand and fresh onions for their famous onion buns are still cut the old-fashioned way.

One of Toronto's oldest and largest family run bakeries, Open Window takes great pride in keeping alive the old-world baking tradition and ensuring quality is never compromised for the sake of quantity.

"Because of the sheer volume of our business — approximately 500 dozen onion buns, 3,000 dozen bagels, 1,500 challahs and 500 blueberry buns a day — it's impossible to do everything by hand," says owner Gail Watkin.

"But wherever we can, we try to maintain original baking methods to ensure the very best in quality and freshness. We also adjust our machines all the time to ensure that the finished product is as close to hand made as possible."

With five wholly-owned stores, 26 franchises and 300 independent outlets and chains that carry Open Window products — including Highland Farms, Hasty Market, Hudson Bay Co. at Queen Street and Longo's Supermarket — Open Window has certainly evolved in many ways since the first store was opened by Watkin's father, Max Feig, and his partners in the spring of 1957.

"We have trucks delivering our goods two or three times a day. This is the secret to our success I believe. It's the ability and willingness to deliver 'round the clock so that our products come to the customer fresh out of the oven."

While kaisers, onion buns, challahs, blueberry buns and bagels continue to be their best-sellers after all these years, Open Window has new products in keeping with the times: multi-grain and stone ground bread for the health conscious, chocolate mousse and creamy carrot cheesecake for the not-so health conscious. More new products are expected by the end of the year.

Watkin has been part of the family business since she was 14, at first sweeping floors and washing trays then graduating to behind-the-counter sales. She now is managing director.

While she is highly devoted to her work, a recent personal tragedy has caused Watkin to divide her time and attention. This past May, her 15-year-old daughter Orly passed away suddenly from meningitis — a rare but deadly bacteria that can be highly contagious. Orly's was an isolated case.

The Orly Watkin Trust Fund for Meningitis Research has been set up to find better antibiotics and prophylactic treatments. Watkins encourages her customers to send donations to Open Window Bakery, 1125 Finch Ave. W., Downsview, Ont., M3J 2E8. A tax receipt will be issued.

Harris outlines platform for economic renewal

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In a pre-election speech, provincial Conservative leader Mike Harris said his party has a plan that would give Ontario thousands of new jobs.

The plan would create 725,000 new jobs by cutting provincial taxes and by reducing government spending in every area except health care.

A 30 per cent cut to provincial income taxes over a three-year period, he said, would inject an extra four billion dollars into Ontario's economy and partially fund the scheme.

"How you save it, how you spend it, and how you invest it, will be the biggest private sector job creation program in the history of Canada."

At a recent luncheon held by the Toronto chapter of the Credit Institute of Canada, Harris outlined the Conservative platform for economic renewal detailed in a booklet called The Common Sense Revolution. The platform includes the downsizing of government and the removal of barriers to growth, such as provincial payroll taxes on small business and of red tape created by government regulation of business.

Harris said Ontario prospered for most of its 200-year history. He blamed government policies and spending for the province's current economic weakness and its slow recovery from the recession.

He warned that countries like Argentina, Chile and Mexico, which have balanced budgets, are poised to overtake Ontario in the hi-tech fields unless we become competitive in the global marketplace.

Mike Harris

"If our entrepreneurs and our businesses don't have the dollars ... to reinvest in the new technologies and the new techniques and the new training for our people, they'll leapfrog over us," he said.

Harris said Conservatives would trim the provincial government payroll, to get more money into the hands of entrepreneurs. Private sector jobs create wealth he stressed, while public sector jobs diminish the wealth of the province.

"With a ten billion deficit this year, clearly we don't have enough private sector jobs to support all these government jobs. The Common Sense Revolution says we're going to fix that; we're going to balance our budget just as fast as we possibly can."

Citing low standards in Ontario's education system — Ontario's students were recently rated as 10th in Canada in science — Harris said too many education dollars go to support bureaucracy. "We need the dollars in the classroom, not in school boards, trustees and bureaucracy."

Harris added the Conservatives would ask all levels of government, agencies, boards and commissions to cut their budgets by 24 per cent and he promised to reduce the number of MPPs from 130 to 99.

Welfare reform is another aspect of the Conservative plan, said Harris, noting that welfare costs have soared to $6.3 billion from $930 million in the recession of 1982. Ontario's welfare rates are an average of 30 per cent higher than in other provinces. A Conservative government would reduce benefits to abled-bodied recipients and make participation in work and training programs mandatory.

"We're going to fundamentally change the whole definition of welfare, how it operates and what we're attempting to do. We're confident — we have seen other jurisdictions that have done it, where it works very, very well."

There is no dissension among Ontario Conservatives about the common sense revolution, according to Harris. The party, he said, is "united behind the plan.

"Now there are some people who think it's the wrong program, the wrong plan . . . about 25 per cent of Ontarians . . . those who believe in socialism, and in big government."

Program aids olim with job prospects

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadians considering aliyah may not realize they can benefit from a $10,000 (US) career counselling program funded through United Israel Appeal (UIA) and run by the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI).

The fledgling program, which went into effect Nov. 1, has already benefited about a dozen people, says Marsha Krieger, AACI's Jerusalem-based national employment coordinator.

Yehoshua Pessin, an American oleh, spends 10 hours a week counselling prospective olim who contact him through the aliyah shlichim in Canada: Udi Savion in Toronto, Yitzchak Dahan in Montreal and Nachum Zayit in Vancouver.

Pessin has already "exceeded his time limit just for Toronto people and is stealing hours from his other [duties]," said Krieger in an interview at the Israel Aliyah Centre in Toronto.

It can take five to seven hours of work to arrange for one pilot trip, Krieger said. Arranging job interviews and professional networking can be done through AACI.

"We think that the biggest help we can give to olim from Canada is to help them find a good quality job," said UIA executive vice-president Steve Ain. "We thought [the program] made a lot of sense."

Marsha Krieger

The money for the program comes from a fund established 15 years ago to help Canadian olim with mortgages. Because of the rise in real estate prices in Israel, the fund is no longer being used for its original purpose, said Ain.

"AACI's primary job is absorption," said Krieger, a native New Yorker who used the organization's services herself after making aliyah nine years ago with her husband and family.

"We realized we could smooth absorption if we gave pre-aliyah information."

The Canadian project is part of a larger effort begun three years ago in the United States. Chicago, Detroit, Los Angeles, Miami, New Jersey and Philadelphia have similar programs.

AACI had over 300 requests in 1994, up from about 100 the year before.

"It's an exciting time to be in Israel. People can see peace coming," Krieger said.

Hamas gunmen kill rabbi

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Raising the Israeli death toll yet again, Islamic terrorists opened fire on a passing car near the West Bank town of Hebron on Sunday, killing a rabbi and wounding an Israeli policeman.

"It is another detestable murder," Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told reporters following the attack on Sunday.

The Islamic fundamentalist movement Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack, which came a day before Israel and the PLO were due to hold talks in Brussels on implementing the next phase of the self-rule accord.

It also came as Hamas continued to compete with Yasser Arafat and his Palestinian Authority for support among Palestinians.

At a rally in Gaza City on Saturday, an estimated 30,000 to 40,000 Islamic militants gathered to demonstrate against Israel and voice their anger at Arafat.

The rally was seen as a response to a Gaza City rally on Nov. 21 at which some 10,000 demonstrators, many of them armed, showed their support for Arafat.

In a clear promise to launch more terrorist attacks, militants at Saturday's rally said they did not bring their guns with them "because we are saving our bullets for the Israelis."

One day later, the bullets flew as gunmen opened fire on a white Subaru driving from Hebron to the settlement of Otniel in the Hebron Hills.

Rabbi Ami Olami, 36, the father of five and the spiritual leader of Otniel, was killed.

His passenger, police officer Ehud Yitzhak, was wounded in the head. After firing shots in the air to get help, a passing vehicle picked Yitzhak up. He was later taken to Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, where his wounds were described as moderate to light.

Jewish settler leaders blamed the government's peace policies for the attack, and said it only strengthened their resolve to stay put.

Working in the mud near the car, ambulance attendants collected bloody tissue to be buried with Rabbi Olami's body. A group of settlers, some of them crying, prayed next to the ambulance that held the body.

Rabbi Olami was an instructor at the hesder yeshivah in Otniel. He had lived in Otniel for about eight years.

According to sources in the territories, Rabbi Olami's murder brings to 100 the number of Israelis killed in terror attacks since the Oslo agreement was signed in September 1993.

Yisrael Zeira, a resident of the nearby settlement of Ma'ale Hever, said said the area that includes Otniel is "the most dangerous area of Judea and Samaria. This is an area where the IDF doesn't patrol often. It is an open area, with scattered Arab homes, where it is easy to hide. The Arabs had autonomy there long before Oslo."

Yesha, the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, issued a statement saying, "This is a direct result of the prime minister's proposal for removing the army from city centres. If such events occur with the army present, then what will happen when the army pulls out?"

Sources said IDF Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak warned the cabinet on Sunday that he expects Islamic attacks to increase both in quantity and sophistication.

Barak charged that talk of evacuating the Gaza settlement of Netzarim encourages such attacks, as it persuades Hamas and Islamic Jihad to believe Israel will cave in under pressure, the sources said.

Rabin tells party to back Shas on meat import ban

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Controversy over the import of non-kosher meat is continuing to plague Israeli politics as Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin seeks to woo the Orthodox Shas Party back into his coalition government.

Rabin last week instructed his Labor Party to back a demand by Shas for new legislation banning the import of non-kosher meat.

Rabin said a government decision to allow the import of non-kosher meat would violate the status quo on matters of religion, to which he said Labor is committed.

Rabin's intervention followed an announcement by Commerce Minister Michael Harish that Israel will start allowing non-kosher meat imports as part of a privatization of Israel's meat industry. Harish's announcement came in the wake of a Supreme Court decision that rejected any ban.

Until recently, the import of meat was essentially a government monopoly. The question of non-kosher imports arose following the liberalization of the meat industry. Non-kosher meat produced in Israel is already available and reportedly would continue to be available despite any new law.

Harish's announcement triggered an angry response from Shas, which has demanded legislation to ban the import of non-kosher meat.

Shas officials declared they would definitely not re-enter the governing coalition without the new legislation.

Rabin wants Shas to rejoin his government to insure wide backing for his peace initiatives. Shas, an original partner in Rabin's 1992 coalition government, dropped out a year later.

Please

Dear friends, Please take a moment to read this letter. We are trying to help a dear friend save her life and we need your help.

Last year, Zsu Zsa Wunsch (Chana Rachel Bas Anna, formerly Susan Marcos) was diagnosed with a rare form of cancer. The doctors in Canada said there was no hope. However, there were two facilities in the world that could treat her: the Cedar Sinai Comprehensive Cancer Center in Los Angeles and the Janker Clinic in Bonn, Germany.

The Canadian medical system could not cover the expenses for an operation in Los Angeles. But Zsu Zsa refused to let her life slip away. She persisted against all odds and thanks to numerous generous souls was able to obtain the necessary funds for the operation. Since the operation, Zsu Zsa has lived her life like she always did, dedicating herself to acts of chesed and kindness, devoting herself to Mitzvos, making new friends and spreading her infectious love of life.

And now, it is that very love of life that drives Zsu Zsa, and her friends around the world, to ask for financial assistance one more time. The doctors at the Janker Clinic in Bonn gave Zsu Zsa a 55% chance of extending her life by 3 months to 10 years. She desperately wants to live and needs at least $50,000.00 immediately.

Please

Please help Zsu Zsa

Reports reveal CIA wants Pollard in prison

The first photograph of Elaine (Esther) Zeitz of Toronto and Jonathan Pollard following their secret prison wedding, announced earlier this year.

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK — On the ninth anniversary of his arrest, convicted spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard was back in the headlines late last month, when a dated CIA statement was published by a defence newsletter and then circulated by most American news organizations.

CIA documents say Pollard should be kept in prison because he knows too much and has shown he will still divulge national secrets, Defense Week reported last Monday.

The CIA sought to distance itself from the story. "This is not new," said Mark Mansfield, an agency spokesman.

The CIA statement on Pollard was written last April in response to a question that had been asked at hearings held by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, said Mansfield.

The CIA's answer, on behalf of "the whole intelligence community," Mansfield said, stated that Pollard was a continuing security risk.

'Not a violent criminal'

In its official answer, the CIA also said, "Pollard is not a violent criminal. However, he retains the ability to harm our national security because of his intelligence, his power of recollection, his history of significant emotional instability, his history of drug abuse and his overriding loyalty to another country."

That material was part of the transcript that was sent to the U.S. Government Printing Office on July 21 and became available about a week later, according to a committee staff member.

Defense Week's story indicated that the CIA comments were made in April.

"I don't know why it's news to either Defense Week or to the vast array of reporters who picked up on it," said Nancy Luque, who has been Pollard's attorney since the beginning of September. "It's no accident that these old, unsubstantiated claims are being trotted out on the day [Prime Minister] Rabin is in Washington."

It was unclear whether Rabin raised the issue of Pollard's release during his recent meeting with President Bill Clinton.

Pollard, who was arrested in 1985 outside the Israeli Embassy in Washington, was convicted of spying for Israel in 1987 and sentenced to life in prison after agreeing to a plea bargain.

Earlier this year, Clinton denied Pollard a commutation of his sentence, despite a fierce campaign by supporters around the world.

Republicans assure Rabin of U.S. support

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week received assurances from the incoming U.S. Republican leadership that Congress will continue its financial and military support for Israel.

Rabin, who held separate meetings with Republican leaders on Capitol Hill, requested that aid programs to Israel continue at current levels, according to incoming House Appropriations Committee chairman Rep. Robert Livingston.

Israeli officials said they were satisfied that the new Republican-led Congress will be forthcoming on those issues.

Strom Thurmond, the hawkish incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, told reporters after meeting Rabin that he expected sustained bilateral cooperation on the Arrow anti-missile program when the Republicans assume leadership in January.

"I think we can continue to cooperate with Israel on the missile program," Thurmond said.

Asked whether he believed the Arrow will progress from the research stage to development, Thurmond said, "I wouldn't want to anticipate right now, but I just told the prime minister that the U.S. is working with Israel on that program, and I think that will continue.

"The US is in accord with Israel on this ballistic missile. As to where the funding will come from, that is a different question, and I won't attempt to go into that at this time."

Israelis considered the meetings important following the stunning U.S. elections three weeks ago which catapulted Republicans to control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 40 years.

There was also concern over recent statements by Sen. Jesse Helms, the incoming Foreign Relations Committee chairman, that foreign aid programs should be re-examined. Israel receives $3 billion annually in U.S. military and economic aide.

Sen. Ted Stevens, the incoming head of the Defence Appropriations Subcommittee, told reporters that he and Rabin discussed the future of the Arrow, but added that long-term cooperation "remains to be seen. We don't have enough information to make a decision on that.

"We told him that as far as our committee is concerned, we didn't expect any change in the positions as expressed by [current chairmen] Sen. [Daniel] Inouye, as compared to the way I'll express it in the coming year. We are going to do our best to fulfill our commitments to Israel."

Inouye has been one of Congress's most vocal Arrow proponents.

After meeting with Rabin, Livingston told The Jerusalem Post that the United States' foreign aid program "is going to be under scrutiny and to the extent that we can economize, or lessen the burden on the American taxpayer, we wish to do so — but not at the expense of the security of Israel."

Livingston said Congress would maintain aid to Israel for as long as the peace process continues, with the hope that the prosperity peace brings will lessen the need for future aid.

Swiss government helped Nazis during World War II

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

GENEVA — Shattering the myth of its own neutrality, the Swiss government last month released documents revealing how the country reached a secret deal with Nazi Germany in 1938 that prevented thousands of Jews from fleeing Germany.

According to the documents, a secret pact was signed by Swiss diplomats and Nazi officials on Sept. 29, 1938, under which all German Jews would have a "J" stamped on their passport to make identification easier and prevent them from entering Switzerland.

According to Swiss historians, the agreement marked a decisive step toward the start of the Holocaust.

Six weeks after the September agreement, the nationwide pogrom known as Kristallnacht took place in Germany, and by then, one of the most vital escape routes for Jews had been shut off.

The Swiss-German pact was at least partly initiated by Heinrich Rothmund, the Swiss chief of police from 1938-1945, who foresaw a huge outflow of Jews from Germany in 1938 as anti-Semitic laws took hold across the Third Reich.

He predicted that many Jews would come cross the Swiss border without being detected, since German nationals did not need a visa at that time to enter Switzerland.

Knowing that Hitler would be offended if Switzerland required visas for German citizens, the Swiss government asked Berlin to divide German passports into racial categories so that the Jews could be immediately identified.

Terrorist's sentence opposed by Rabin

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — The decision by a military court to impose the death sentence against an Islamic terrorist has revived a debate over the death penalty here.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has voiced his opposition to the death sentence handed down last week against Said Badarneh, a West Bank resident convicted of playing a key role in the April 13 suicide bombing of a bus in the central Israeli town of Hadera.

Five Israelis were killed in that attack, as was the suicide bomber allegedly recruited by Badarneh. Another 30 people were wounded in the explosion, for which Hamas later claimed responsibility.

"Until now, Israel has not executed a single Palestinian terrorist, and I think that was right. It would be a mistake to carry out a death sentence," Rabin said last Friday.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres also criticized the sentence, saying he was "proud that Israel isn't a nation of the gallows."

The Israeli human rights group B'Tselem echoed that stance, but a number of right-wing legislators urged that the sentence be carried out.

"Death should be answered by death," said Rehavam Ze'evi of the nationalist Moledet Party.

The only person ever executed in Israel was Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, who was hanged in 1962.

Another accused Nazi collaborator, John Demjanjuk, was sentenced to death in Israel in 1988. But the Israeli Supreme Court vacated the decision last year, finding reasonable doubt that Demjanjuk was the man known as "Ivan the Terrible" of Treblinka. The decision cleared the way for Demjanjuk to return to the United States.

Israeli military courts have imposed the death sentences in only two other cases, but both decisions were later converted to multiple life sentences.

The three judges in the Badarneh case wrote that they chose the death sentence because life sentences do not deter Islamic terrorists bent on killing Israelis. They added that the 24-year-old Badarneh showed no remorse.

Badarneh, a member of Hamas' Izz a-Din al-Kassam military wing, said he was prepared to die and would not appeal the court's decision.

An appeal could be made on his behalf by either the judge advocate-general or by the commander in charge of the central sector, Maj.-Gen. Ilan Biran, under whose jurisdiction the trial took place.

Biran could also overturn the decision himself and sentence Badarneh to six life terms, the sentence reportedly sought by the prosecutors in the case.

Arafat claims Israel sold Hamas weapons

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK — PLO leader Yasser Arafat claims Israelis sold 26,000 weapons to Hamas, hoping this would lead to a Palestinian civil war, according to a report published in last Sunday's New York Times.

Separately, the newspaper also reported that Arafat recently sought to visit Washington to meet with U.S. President Bill Clinton. It said Arafat was told Clinton had no time for a meeting.

In a long article in the paper's magazine, writer Michael Kelly portrays Arafat as a desperate leader whose flaws include incompetence and vanity, and whose bungling has left Gaza ever more beleaguered.

Entitled "In Gaza, Peace Meets Pathology," the article says, "All that proliferates here are romanticized violence and 720 tons of solid waste daily."

Kelly notes that, in his pact with Israel, Arafat promised to disarm Gaza's terror factions. However, "the work of Gaza's gunmen is returning the relationship between the Israelis and the Palestinians to its accustomed base of kill and be killed."

In an interview with Arafat, conducted three months ago, Kelly asked the PLO chief why his police had not tried to disarm Hamas.

The Israelis, with "the biggest and strongest army in the Middle East, haven't been able to stop them. We are doing our best," he replied.

"You know," Arafat said in that interview, "before we arrived here, the Israelis had open markets — not black markets, open markets — in armaments here. Within months, 26,000 arms had been sold.

"I told Mr. Rabin how this had been done openly," Arafat said. "Was it done by chance? No, it wasn't by chance. It was because some of the security leaders in Israel were hoping there would be a civil war here."

No White House spokesman was available for comment on Arafat's request for a meeting with Clinton.

Beilin blasts Canadian refugee policy

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Canada has accepted as refugees almost as many Israelis in the past six months as in the previous five years, Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin told the Knesset recently.

Beilin said Israeli representatives raise the thorny issue with Canadian authorities almost every day, but added he is pessimistic about a change in policy because the cases are heard by a non-governmental public committee (the Immigration and Refugee Board).

In response to a question by Likud MK David Mena, Beilin said that between January and June of this year, 268 immigrants from Israel originally from the former Soviet Union were accepted as refugees after claiming they had suffered discrimination and persecution in Israel.

Yossi Beilin

That's compared to the 297 requests from Israelis granted in the previous five years.

(Beilin's numbers agree with figures released to The CJN last week by the IRB. They also show that 366 refugee claims by Israelis were turned down in the first six months of this year, and that 57 claims were withdrawn).

There has also been a sharp increase in the proportion of requests granted. The IRB granted almost 50 per cent of the Israeli requests in the first half of 1994, compared with just over 10 per cent in the previous five years, Beilin said.

Beilin called the Canadian policy "insulting" to Israel but added it should be kept in mind that the IRB also granted citizenship to alleged political refugees from the United States.

In a meeting held in Toronto recently, Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella urged Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi to issue a directive instructing the (IRB) that "there are certain countries from which refugees should not be admitted."

These countries, including Israel, are democracies with human rights codes and protection for individual rights, Abella said. The minister told Abella that he would leave it up to the IRB to reform its procedures.

Roughly 2,000 Israeli citizens are now in Canada seeking refugee status. The vast majority are originally from former Soviet republics who gained Israeli citizenship upon arriving in the Jewish state. Often, they are mixed faith couples who claim they and their children were harassed, beaten and mistreated in Israel.

Aussie Jews come under attack

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY — The Australian Jewish community came under attack by members of the legislature as the Australian House of Representatives began debate on proposed anti-racist legislation.

Graeme Campbell, a member of the ruling Labor Party, said members of the Jewish community had "forced" the government into introducing legislation on hate crimes.

During his speech, he also attacked the Zionist Federation of Australia, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and the president of the Council of Western Australian Jewry.

Campbell, who has a history of opposition to concerns expressed by the Australian Jewish community, last year broke a long-standing boycott of the Australian League of Rights, a racist organization, when he gave a keynote address at its annual meeting in Melbourne.

Campbell also criticized Australian Jewry for citing arson attacks on synagogues as examples of hate crimes, claiming the fires which caused great damage to Sydney synagogues during the 1991 Persian Gulf War had "to do with the Middle East."

He added that recent fires at synagogues were likely due to internal Jewish community disputes.

TORONTO — What do you do if your birthday is inconsiderate enough to fall on Chanukah?

Matisyohu Dov Ber Chaim Tzvi, whose birthday is on the third night of Chanukah, tells author Dina Rosenfeld (and the thoroughly entertained readers) exactly what he decided to do, in the delightful book A Chanukah Story for Night Number Three (Hachai Publishing, 1989).

When his mother goes shopping, Matisyohu Dov Ber Chaim Tzvi (any kid will get a kick out of the repetition of the name throughout the book) decides to make a giant latke — "The most giant latke there ever could be/For my birthday on Chanukah night number three!"

With the help of a cement truck, a hospital kitchen and a sympathetic street cleaning truck, he manages to create the biggest latke-cum-birthday cake ever, which he shares, together with the Chanukah spirit, with the patients in the hospital.

Young readers (and the not-so-young) will especially enjoy the illustrations by Harris Mandel. Sticking largely to shades of moss green, butterscotch and pale blue, he is able to keep the readers' attention on the humorous situations depicted, such as Matisyohu's being dumped into the baking pan together with the ingredients, the cement truck with its Chanukah decorations of nun, gimmel, hay and shin written on the mixer and, my favorite, the devastation in the kitchen, with eggs all over the floor and batter sticking to the ceiling.

The whole book is written in rhyme, which is appealing to the younger child, and is apt to have the slightly older one chanting, "That's just where we went, and that's just what he did,/ Off of the truck with the batter, I slid."

The book is recommended for ages 3 to 6.

Jewish Film Society opens with a comedy

TORONTO — The Toronto Jewish Film Society, the oldest Jewish film society in North America, begins its 17th season Dec. 4 with a showing of the British comedy Leon The Pig Farmer.

The society is a volunteer-run program of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre dedicated to showing films of Jewish interest that "are either hard to see or hard to come by," said chair Ethel Teitelbaum.

This season the society will co-present films with Cinematheque Ontario, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee and Friends of Yiddish. Critic and author J. Hoberman is scheduled to introduce the Yiddish film, The Light Ahead, which screens next October.

All screenings take place at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St., Sundays at 7:30 p.m. Single tickets go on sale 15 minutes before showtime. Members are encouraged to show up early to guarantee their seats.

The Toronto Jewish film Society's membership costs $40 (including GST) and entitles individuals to eight screenings.

For more information, call Bill Emery at the Jewish Community Centre at 924-6211.

On Being A Jew: A Reform Perspective by Rabbi Dow Marmur, Holy Blossom Temple $14.95 (paper)

On the occasion of his 10th anniversary as Senior Rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple, Toronto, grateful members have published this miscellany of Rabbi Marmur's articles on a variety of Jewish subjects.

The 25 pieces are divided into six categories: Judaism, Zion, Diaspora, Actions, Neighbors and Confessions. Almost all of them have appeared in other publications, eight of them in Viewpoints.

The author tackles complex, difficult and controversial questions honestly, thoughtfully and with insights gleaned from his learning and rabbinical experience.

Drawing his inspiration from the Menorah, he offers seven reasons why Judaism still matters to Jews: tradition as a source of wisdom, a sense of history, the ability to feel pain and sympathy, community, God, testimony to the presence of God and hope. Each of these facets is regarded as precious in an amalgam of enduring Judaism.

Some traditional Jews are concerned with abolishing discrimination against women in their synagogues. In similar fashion, "Reform Jews are putting on kippot and tallitot and creating chavurot. It is in these groups, not in rallies on behalf of Israel or in Holocaust memorial meetings, that Jewish life is being renewed. It is the common quest, rather than the denominational line of demarcation, that brings these people closer to God."

In a 1987 article, he points out the growing problems of Conservative Judaism. "In religion, you can be crazy, even lazy, but not hazy. It seems that Conservative Judaism is paying a price for its haziness." Many former members of Conservative congregations have affiliated with Reform. This has led to the introduction of traditional forms of observance and worship. Tensions have been created as a result, but today Reform speaks with greater confidence than ever. "I can see that it contains the possibility of becoming the normative Judaism of tomorrow."

The author argues against patrilineal descent in determining the Jewish identity of children. "It may be democratic, just and biblical, but it is not where normative Judaism is today . . . Is there not a danger that the possible institutional successes that the decision on patrilineality has brought to the Reform movement, may have detrimental long-term consequences for Reform in knesset Yisrael?"

Should the Canadian Jewish community be involved in social issues? Yes, asserts the author. He suggests that areas of concern should include economic justice, rights for women, unemployment and the disabled. Judaism should also have something to say about abortion, euthanasia and capital punishment.

For the author, Israel must be central to our communal concerns and personal identity. "Without that bond our future seems problematic. We may all have to adopt the mentality of yordim, men and women who have left Israel 'only for a limited time.' "

In a personal statement of how he found faith, he confides that both he and his wife, as children, survived the Holocaust. "Why did we survive? To serve our people seemed the most obvious response. And out of that service, coupled with personal experiences, we have come to serve God together."

His training at London's Leo Baeck College did not teach the rabbi "how to kiss babies at random in the community. I am still deficient in that art. But it taught me how to handle texts and read books." For this, all of us should be grateful as we welcome this seminal anthology and wish its author many additional years of vigorous and unselfish community service.

Essay Contest: Two top prizes of $1,800 and 10 secondary prizes of $750, are to be awarded in the fourth annual Kaplun Essay Contest, sponsored by the Morris J. and Betty Kaplun Foundation, P.O. Box 234428, Great Neck, N.Y. 11023. As well, entrance prizes of $18 each go to the first 50 essays received at each of two levels.

The Level 1 topic (ages 12 to 14) is: Goals for the American Jewish Community for My Generation. The Level 2 topic (ages 15 to 17) is: The Influence of Jewish Values on the Founding Fathers and The American Way of Life. Canadian contestants are invited to apply the topics to Canada instead of the United States.

Essays are to be typed, double-spaced, and no more than 1,000 words for Level 1 and 1,500 words for Level 2. Contestant's name, address, phone number, school name, grade and date of birth must appear at top right of his or her entry and contestant's name must appear on all additional pages.

Entries must be postmarked by March 6. Finalists will be notified by May 12 and prizes are to be awarded by June 30.

Ori Friedman in Performance: Thornhill's' 12-year-old piano prodigy Ori Friedman performs with the York Symphony Orchestra on Saturday Dec. 3, 7:30 p.m., at the Marylake Shrine (2 km north of King Side Road off Keele St.), and again on Sunday Dec. 4, 7:30 p.m. at the Markham Theatre (171 Town Centre Blvd.).

The Israeli-born Friedman, who is to play his own cadenzas for Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 21 in C (K 467), has had a meteoric career since he started studying music only three years ago. In the first 18 months, he won 12 first-place awards in Canadian music competitions and received several scholarships. Last year, he performed with the National Chamber Orchestra at the Recital Hall of the North York Performing Arts Centre (now the Ford Centre), and he recently debuted in New York City.

The concerts also feature the Chanukah Suite No. 2 by another local artist, Milton Barnes. Tickets are $15 for adults. For tickets for Saturday, call (416) 410-0860; for Sunday, (905) 479-0201.

Toronto Writer Profiles Dancer: Author and journalist Diane Solway, who was born in Toronto and did undergraduate studies at the University of Toronto, writes frequently for the Arts & Leisure section of the New York Times and for many other American publications, often on her specialty of dance. Now a resident of New York, Solway has recently published A Dance Against Time: The Brief, Brilliant Life of a Joffrey Dancer, profiling the star dancer and choreographer Edward Stierle.

Currently at work on a biography of Rudolf Nureyev, Solway credits her mother and great aunt, Sylvia Schwartz, for her love of books, writing and ballet. Another great aunt, Ruth Schwartz, owned a popular bookstore in downtown Toronto; after the death of Ruth Schwartz, Canada's leading prize for children's literature was established in her honor.

At the Israel Museum in Jerusalem: A major retrospective of 125 works by the famous impressionist of Jewish origin, Camille Pissaro, is on view until Jan. 9. In the Youth Wing, the show Heroes: Past and Present features true and false heroes from Moses to Mussolini, Homer Simpson to Captain Hook.

The Israel Museum also features a major exhibit from the collection of Japanese artwork of Jacob Pins, a Jerusalem artist in his own right. More than 175 examples of the art of the Japanese print are on view. Pins, who built his impressive collection of Japanese art while living in Israel, has bequested the entire collection to the Israel Museum.

Chabad Chanukah Telethon: On Dec. 3 from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. the seventh night of Chanukah, the annual Chabad L'Chaim-To Life Telethon hosted by Jan Murray will air in Los Angeles on KCOP Channel 13.

Among those scheduled to appear are Jon Voight, Mayim Bialik, Jack Klugman, Edward James Olmos, Estelle Getty, Perry King, Steve Allen, Dick Van Patten, William Windom and Lois Nettleton.

Foundation looks at the stars of the future

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The highly acclaimed chamber ensemble, Jerusalem Music Centre Young Trio, performed for a delighted audience of over 300 during a recent gala at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

The piano, violin and cello company represents the cream of young Israeli artists. Entitled Catch a Rising Star, the concert was hosted by the Toronto chapter of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF).

"These are indeed the stars of the future," commented Ronald Bresler, CICF Toronto president. "They demonstrate the wealth of young talent currently being nurtured and developed in Israel. Artists of this tremendous calibre are intensively trained at the Jerusalem Music Centre under the guidance of true musical masters."

Bresler said that such cultural exchanges will bridge the gap between Israel and her neighbors.

Members of the Young Trio are Guy Gedayev, Michael Vittenson and Dmitri Steinberg.

Gedayev, a 14-year-old cellist, had already appeared as the featured soloist with the Israel Chamber Orchestra at the age of 10. A native of Israel, his most recent achievement was winning the Clairmont competition for cellists.

Vittenson, 16, emigrated to Israel from Uzbekistan and at the age of 8 made his solo violin debut with the Tashkent Symphony.

Pianist Steinberg, 17, a new arrival to Israel, was born in Moscow where he was a top student at the famous Gnesin music school.

The trio have performed together for two years and are currently enrolled at the Jerusalem Music Centre. The centre was opened in 1976 under the auspices of Isaac Stern and Pablo Casals.

Concert artists

Today, the centre's pride is its state-of-the-art recording studio, where students record tapes and demos for world distribution.

The evening's performance was the final stop in the trio's Canadian leg of their North American tour, which took them to Montreal, Ottawa, Washington, D.C., New York and Connecticut.

The music offered to the Toronto audience included Beethoven's Piano Trio in D Major, Opus 1 (Ghosts); Schubert's Adagio in E Flat Major, Opus 148, plus works by Shalit and Shostakovich.

Accompanying the trio on their tour is Benny Gal-Ed, director of the Jerusalem Music Centre.

"It is very important for these young people to be heard, exposed directly to audiences as much as possible," he explained. "For musicians, this is crucial to their maturation process as concert artists."

The spectacular scenery of Cape Breton

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

CAPE BRETON — One hour's flight north of Halifax, at the edge of the Atlantic, durable mountains meet the sea on beautiful Cape Breton.

Cape Breton has some of the most spectacular scenery in eastern North America. Physically reminiscent of the Scottish Highlands, the island boasts villages like Iona, where Gaelic is still spoken, and Acadian communities like Cheticamp, where French predominates.

Highlights include the Keltic Lodge, several very good museums and the magnificent 250-year-old Fortress of Louisbourg. The 300-km Cabot Trail, which follows much of the coast, is considered one of the world's great scenic highways.

Magnificently dominating the rugged Atlantic coastline at Middle Head, Keltic Lodge provides a relaxing oceanside atmosphere.

The hub of the region is Sydney, an industrial city of 28,000. For many tourists, the jewel of the region is the resort town of Baddeck, which sits on the gentle Bras d'Or Lake, a vast internal waterway with a thousand miles of coastline. For many years, renowned inventor Alexander Graham Bell and his family summered in a mansion that still stands near the lake. Nearby is the intriguing Alexander Graham Bell Museum.

A drive up the Cabot Trail brings one to Keltic Lodge, one of three provincially-run lodges in Nova Scotia, and to the rugged Cape Breton National Highlands Park. Here the waves are among the angriest anywhere on the Atlantic, and the views among the finest. People who have seen the Atlantic only in Florida will be overwhelmed by the beauty of the coastline.

At rural hideaways like the 65-year-old Normaway Inn, guests may hike the aromatic woods or fish the Margaree for its celebrated trout or salmon. South of the Cabot Trail and about three hours north of Halifax by car, the Dundee Resort has a challenging golf course with superb ocean views.

One of the most spectacular tourist sites on the continent, Louisbourg, the great fortress of New France, is also one of the best-kept secrets in the North American tourism industry. Construction of the fortress commenced in 1719 and, for a quarter century thereafter, it contained a thriving city with some 3,000 citizens and a bustling port. It fell in 1774 to the British, who razed it to the ground so the French could never reclaim it.

When I visited Louisbourg, my guide recalled playing in the vast ruins there as a child, some three decades earlier. A mammoth $25-million restoration has since brought about one-fifth of the immense fort back to its original exuberant magnificence.

Tours of Louisbourg National Historic Park are $4 from June to September, and free in May and October. The place is usually bustling with tourists, and dozens of costumed staff recreate the past. Although it is normally closed in winter, I had an opportunity to be guided through the almost-deserted fortress on an unusually mild day last February.

Even in summer, the wind blowing in from the ocean is cooler than temperatures inland. It's a cold Atlantic wind that blows across the Louisbourg plain in winter, too.

In winter, the stark hills of Cape Breton possess a grace as pure and inescapable as a bagpipe ballad. Although Cape Breton is most beautiful in late September and early October, when the wooded hills surrender to the poignant reds and golds of autumn, I wouldn't turn down another opportunity to circle the Cabot Trail on a calm winter's day.

I'd go back to Nova Scotia at a moment's notice, any time of year. Like its coastline, the province's history is colorful, long and dramtic, filled with French and British soldiers, pirates, rumrunners, wealthy ship captains and uprooted Acadian settlers. Halifax, the capital, was a thriving international seaport when Toronto was known as Muddy York and Vancouver was hardly known at all.

Israelis visit Jordan

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Three days after Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Jordanian King Hussein exchanged ratified copies of their historic peace treaty, the first group of Israeli tourists entered Jordan using their Israeli passports.

The group of 35 people passed through the southern border, crossing at Eilat, for a two-day visit to the Jordanian cities of Aqaba and Petra.

"We feel excited. I think we have the luck to be able to participate in a kind of small personal history," Moshe Hananel, manager of Galilee Tours who organized the trip, told Israel Radio. "This is the real meaning of peace for us."

A second group of Israeli tourists was due to cross into Jordan using the Sheik Hussein Bridge, the northern border crossing that was officially opened almost three weeks ago.

The July 25 Washington Declaration which officially brought to an end the 46-year state of war between the two countries called for the opening of the two border crossings, but allowed only third-country nationals to travel between Israel and Jordan.

The Oct. 26 Israeli-Jordanian peace treaty, which paved the way for full diplomatic, economic and cultural ties, enabled Israelis and Jordanians to visit each other's countries.

As a result of the peace treaty, an Israeli delegation from the Foreign Ministry, headed by Director-General Uri Savir, is scheduled to travel to the Jordanian capital of Amman to choose a site for the Israeli embassy.

Meanwhile, the daily newspaper Yediot Achronot has reported that senior Jordanian diplomat Ziad Al-Majali will assume the top post in the Israeli department of the Jordanian Foreign Ministry.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

Jackson's Point, Past & Present: On the prescribed advice of my friend, Dr. Shel Krakofsky, a physician-author living near London, Ont., I have read Jackson's Point (Oberon Press, 1989), a book of poems by 44-year-old Jewish writer Ken Sherman of Toronto. Sherman's many evocative images of life in this Lake Simcoe resort town, where many Jewish families took their summer holidays in the '50s and early '60s, include poignant word-portraits illustrating what it must have been like coming of age then in this cottage community an hour's drive north of Toronto.

Here is Sherman's poem, Friday Night Services: "Walking home down main street,/ I catch my reflection/ in the window of the hall/ where the local toughs/ drink and dance./ I am startled to see/ that I have forgotten/ to remove my skullcap."

And here is the beginning of his poem, Synagogue: "It still stands,/ its weathered bricks, yellowish,/ a tone of parchment/ besieged by the imperious pines,/ the thick, shadowing maples,/ a landscape/ verdant, non-semitic . . ."

I, too, remember Jackson's Point from the late '50s, when my siblings and I, watched over by parents and assorted relatives, would step carefully into the lake, wearing running shoes to protect our feet from the stony bottom. I remember the many times we went fishing off the pier with my grandfather, the way he gently showed us his fishing technique, and the way the fish always eluded my anxious line.

I remember the tall, trimmed roadside hedges that made the town seem like a polite English village, and the many Yiddish voices that assured us we were in the midst of a more familiar milieu. And I remember the small country synagogue that drew many of our relatives, walking solemnly down the road in their best clothes, each Saturday morning.

These and other reminiscences crowded my brain recently during my first visit back to Jackson's Point in about three decades. "The Jewish neighborhood was over here," says Hugh Sibbald, vice-president of the Briars Resort and Country Club, indicating a few square blocks of cottages on a large framed map hanging on a wall. "Unfortunately, the area really went downhill in the '60s. A lot of the town got really seedy and was frequented by bikers, and the Jews stopped coming."

Relax before inviting hearths

As a Jackson's Point tradition, however, The Briars Inn & Country Club is still going strong. It consists of a complex of comfortable wings built around an 1840 Regency House. The house was built by a sea-captain named Bourchier on land which the Crown granted to him as reward for his valiant service in the Royal Army during the Napoleonic Wars. Hugh Sibbald's great-great uncle, Frank Sibbald, purchased the house and its 1,200-acre grounds from Bourchier's widow in 1879, and it has been in his family ever since.

From the top of a 70-foot tower, which looks medieval and Florentine but was actually constructed in 1988, one gets a good view of the well-landscaped grounds, which feature several restored Victorian structures. One of these, an attractive round structure with a pineapple decoration on top, is actually the only octagonal, bell-roofed, brick peacock house in North America, Sibbald claims.

In winter, visitors enjoy hiking, cross-country skiing, and relaxing before one of the Briars' numerous inviting hearths. Winter rates range from $105 to $155 per person per day, including three meals. The Briars, 55 Hedge Road, Jackson's Point Ont. L0E 1L0. Toll-free line, (800) 465-2376.

The Color of Money: The Greater Rochester Visitors Association (GRVA) and the Chase Manhattan Bank have announced a joint promotion to encourage Rochester-area merchants, attractions, hotels, restaurants and other businesses to readily accept Canadian currency. A special hotline has been set up so that area shopkeepers may quickly obtain the latest exchange rate.

"We're offering this program as a courtesy to Canadian visitors," says GRVA president Richard Luber. "Many Canadians often decide to come down and enjoy some of our local attractions on a holiday or weekend when banks are closed. We hope to make it easy for them to use Canadian currency while they are here."

Jewish school (cheder) in Podolia, Ukraine, in the 19th century.

Russian Jewish life examined

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — A fascinating exhibition at New York's Jewish Museum (on view through March 5, 1995) is entitled Jewish Life in Czarist Russia: A World Rediscovered.

The treasure trove of objects and lore from Russian Jewish life prior to World War I comes from the Jewish collection of the State Ethnographic Museum in St. Petersburg, and has never before been seen in the United States.

The exhibit has been travelling for 2½ years, and has already been to the Amsterdam Jewish Historical Museum, museums in Cologne and Frankfurt, and the Israel Museum.

Remnants of a rich culture obliterated by the tumult and terror of the Stalinist period and partially destroyed by World War II bombing, they were assumed by Western scholars to have been lost forever. Relatively few of thousands of items originally collected by Russian-Jewish writer, ethnographer and revolutionary Shlomo An-sky have survived intact.

An-sky, author of the classic play The Dybbuk, led an expedition (1911-1914) to the Pale of Settlement — the region from Minsk to Warsaw and from Vilna to the Black Sea, where Russian Jews were forced to live from the late 18th century until World War I. He and his team rescued memorabilia of Jewish folk life and culture from the nearly five million Jews who lived in the Pale, the largest, most concentrated Jewish population in the world.

Susan Braunstein, a curator at the Jewish Museum, coordinated the exhibition. She corrected a common misconception that Jews were isolated from other Russian communities: "Although most Jews did live in shtetls, Jews also lived in cities, in small towns, and even in rural settlements. We want to show the public that the concept that all Eastern European Jews came from an isolated Jewish world is a myth. The exhibit clearly reveals that many Russian Jews interacted culturally and dynamically with people around them and interchange was prevalent."

The exhibit offers captions as a frame of reference: Interactions With Russian Culture; Jewish Population Beliefs; The Jewish Population, a Rich Diversity; The Men's Domain and Women's Roles; The World of Prayer; and Religious Study.

A Jewish family

Among the 330 objects are everyday costumes with styles greatly influenced by non-Jewish aristocratic fashions: a fur-trimmed hat (shtreiml) and caftan worn by Chassidim; prayer shawls, ritual fringed undergarments; and kiddish cups, menorahs and candleholders. Also on display are photographs depicting homes, workplaces and synagogues.

Shlomo An-sky in 1916

Preserved Torah ark curtain from 1751

Of an exotic nature are Chanukah lamps decorated with elements of Russian folklore, musical instruments from klezmer bands, magic charms and amulets to ward off sickness and the evil eye, chess sets with stars of David on the horses' heads and rabbi outfits covering the bishops, women's bodice ornaments made of costly fabrics and metallic embroidery, and a beautifully preserved gold and red Torah ark curtain from 1751 embroidered with Czarist crown.

A videotape, Shtetl: Landscape of Memory, outlines shtetl history from the reality of An-sky's days to a mythologized memory of the past. The production takes the viewer from home movies to shtetls to Broadway's Fiddler On The Roof.

Braunstein concluded: "What is most exciting about the exhibit is that this incredible piece of the past has resurfaced at this time in world history. We are delighted to bring it to New York and show it to the descendants of East European Jewry and to others who want to learn more about this important culture."

Jewish Museum is located at 1109 Fifth Ave. at 92nd St. Call (212) 423-3200 for further information.

Advertorial

TALMA GELLER

by Ross Fattori

"Agent Taps A Burgeoning Hong Kong Market"

When Talma Geller knocked on her first door as a real estate agent seven years ago she had no idea what to expect.

A short time later, she sold an exclusive home in the Bayview & 16th area of Richmond Hill. The buyer was a Hong Kong immigrant. Since then Talma Geller has sold hundreds of homes to Hong Kong - and local - buyers and has helped to develop a substantial niche market in the process.

"At the time (1987) a huge influx of Hong Kong residents began settling in Richmond Hill," she explains with soft-spoken modesty. "My timing must have been good because I soon began handling more and more transactions within that market."

Talma soon began circulating her feature sheets and flyers in Chinese and started learning Chinese as well.

Timing is one thing; so is customer satisfaction. Talma treats clients the way she would like to be treated - honestly, fairly and professionally.

"I try to take the fear and stress out of buying or selling a home," she states. "I do this by updating clients constantly so they know what to expect." Her clients concur. One satisfied Richmond Hill client wrote: "You have done a wonderful job of not only providing a very complete analysis but also guiding us every step of the way."

Her personal approach to selling continues to pay off for her clients. So far this year every one of her listings has sold!

As a top producer at RE/MAX REALTRON REALTY, Talma Geller credits much of her success to the company's highly professional and supporting environment.

A computerized front desk system, "hands on" management and a hard working staff make Talma's job a lot easier. "I particularly enjoy our 'Power Mondays' where top agents get together and brain storm new ideas," she says. Many of these ideas relate to improving customer service, which is an ongoing priority for the entire company.

"For most people, buying or selling a home is one of the most important decisions they will ever make," she says. "Helping them understand and feel comfortable with the process, and helping them achieve their goals - that's my job. My reward is when they recommend me to their friends and relatives and I end up selling or buying there too."

Talma is the first to admit that spare time is a luxury. What little time she does manage for herself is reserved for her husband and four children.

Talma Geller has received numerous achievement awards and her highest degree of success has been the result of her dedication, commitment to her clients and meticulous attention to details.

Indeed, this successful realtor has come a long way since knocking on that first door seven years ago.

Talma Geller is a sales representative at Re/max Realtron Realty Inc. (905) 764-6000

THE PRECIOUS TOMATO

A shopper in Tel Aviv examines a tomato imported from Holland and priced at 9.9 shekels ($3 Cdn.) per kilo, more than double the normal price. Prices of tomatoes - a staple of the national diet - have skyrocketed in the past month due to a poor crop and a cholera scare in Gaza. In some places the price has hit 15 shekels a kilo, forcing many Israelis to buy the precious fruit one at a time. [Israel Photo]

Early empowerment gives Palestinians more control

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Implementation of Israel's peace accord with the Palestine Liberation Organization passed another milestone last week as officials transferred authority for taxation and health affairs in the West Bank to the Palestinians.

The transfers last Thursday marked the completion of so-called "early empowerment," under which Palestinians took over control of five key areas of authority in the West Bank, including education, welfare and tourism.

Israel formally handed over responsibility for tax collection at a ceremony in the civil administration building in the West Bank town of Ramallah. Health affairs were handed over during a ceremony in Nablus.

The ceremonies were delayed until the Palestinian Authority (PA) received confirmation from donor countries meeting in Belgium that money would be available to cover day-to-day expenses for the next few months.

At a two-day meeting in Brussels, a group of foreign donor nations, along with the World Bank, agreed to provide about $200 million (US) in grants and loans to support the cash-strapped PA.

The donor countries have pledged more than $2 billion to the Palestinians over five years, but little of the roughly $700 million pledged for 1994 has come through. Many nations have refused to fulfill their pledges because of PLO leader Yasser Arafat's refusal to demonstrate accountability for the funds.

Canada has pledged some $55 million over five years.

Shortly before the conference began, the World Bank signed a deal with Arafat for a $58 million line of credit to the PA.

The grant was provided by Saudi Arabia, Denmark and Switzerland.

World Bank sources said recent clashes in Gaza between Hamas and Palestinian police pressured the donors to start funneling money to the PA.

The transfer of powers came just days before Israel and the PLO were due to meet in Cairo to begin negotiations on the next stage of autonomy.

Those negotiations will focus on the redeployment of Israeli troops in the West Bank and the scheduling of Palestinian elections.

The talks are expected to be difficult. Israel has expressed concern that the security of Israelis living in the territories cannot be guaranteed if and when a troop withdrawal takes place.

IKEA urged to expand business to Israel

TORONTO — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is urging Swedish furniture giant IKEA to dispatch a fact-finding team to Israel, to determine whether the Jewish State would be fertile ground for expansion.

Such a move would help dispel suggestions that IKEA complied with the Arab boycott of Israel and help redeem IKEA founder Ingvar Kamprad for his postwar flirtation with the fascist cause, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, a spokesman for the centre.

Rabbi Cooper said he met with IKEA's North American president Goran Carstedt to discuss recent reports from

The News In Brief

CANADA

Support for Gun Proposals

OTTAWA — Jewish groups are applauding Justice Minister Alan Rock's tough proposals on gun control.

In a statement, B'nai Brith Women of Canada president Arlene Fagan urged Rock not to back down in the face of fierce opposition to his proposals from the gun lobby.

BBW/C said it is pleased the proposals call for banning certain hand guns and assault weapons. Fagan said polls have shown most Canadians support stronger gun control measures.

Canadian Jewish Congress national law and social action committee chair Prof. Gerald Gall called Rock's plan "reasonable," and urged the minister to table legislation "as soon as possible."

Israeli Refugee Claims

MONTREAL — The Immigration and Refugee Board's (IRB) third quarter report shows that Israel continues to be one of the major sources of refugee claims in Canada.

Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 30, the IRB heard to completion claims from 590 people from Israel, most of them originally from the former Soviet Union. Only Sri Lanka, Somalia, India and Iran were the country of origin for more refugee claimants.

During that period, the IRB granted refugee status to 344 Israeli citizens and denied it to 445. Seventy-two claims by Israelis were withdrawn or abandoned.

Quints at Mount Sinai

TORONTO — Quintuplets born last week at Mount Sinai Hospital here are in fair condition, a spokeswoman said.

The three girls and two boys were born 13 weeks early by caesarean section to a 30-year-old mother and 26-year-old father.

The parents had been on a fertility program. The quints are the couple's first children.

The parents "are feeling a little overwhelmed," said hospital spokeswoman Sara Taylor. The babies weigh between 14 ounces and two pounds, 6½ ounces. As of last week, they were on ventilators in the hospital's neo-natal intensive care unit.

Abe Arnold is Honored

WINNIPEG — Jewish historian, journalist and editor Abe Arnold is to be one of two honorees at a tribute dinner here Dec. 8.

Arnold and union activist Ed Blackman are scheduled to receive the sixth annual Manitoba Human Rights Achievements Award, bestowed by the Community Legal Education Association.

Arnold, a former editor of Vancouver's Jewish Western Bulletin and co-author of Jewish Life in Canada, is being recognized for his life-long work in human rights, civil liberties and race relations.

ISRAEL

Road Deaths Rise

TEL AVIV — Despite attempts to heighten public awareness about road safety, the number of fatal accidents on Israeli roads continues to increase.

Seven people were killed in road accidents throughout the country last Monday alone, bringing the death toll so far this year to 480 — a 10 per cent increase over the number of traffic deaths during all of 1993.

If fatalities among Israelis living in the territories are included, the death toll for the year so far rises to 600.

Cold Claims Homeless Man

JERUSALEM — With frigid weather here claiming the life of at least one homeless person over the weekend, attention has once again focused on the plight of the homeless in Israel.

As temperatures plunged and snow, hail and rain fell around the country, the body of a homeless man was found in the backyard of an apartment building in Bnei Brak, near Tel Aviv.

Police believed the man, whose name was not released, died of exposure.

HIV Numbers Down

JERUSALEM — The number of new HIV carriers in Israel has declined this year, but Health Minister Ephraim Sneh last week warned against becoming complacent about AIDS.

During the first 11 months of this year, 135 Israelis were diagnosed with AIDS, compared with 174 for all of 1993.

The number of known HIV carriers is 1,226, but the actual number (including those not tested) is estimated by the ministry at between 2,000 and 2,500.

Israeli Satellite

TEL AVIV — Israel will launch an advanced communications satellite next November, officials with Israel Aircraft Industries announced last week.

The Amos-1 satellite, which is being built by IAI in cooperation with Deutsche Aerospace of Germany and the French Alcatel Aerospace company, will be launched by a French-made Ariane rocket from the African nation of Guinea.

The satellite is expected to remain in orbit for 11 years and will relay video, voice and data transmission from Iran to Libya, and from Ukraine to Sudan.

Auschwitz Guides Train

TEL AVIV — Fifty Polish guides at the Auschwitz Museum have completed a three-week course at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem designed to provide them with a background in Jewish history.

The guides at the museum, located on the grounds of the former Nazi concentration camp, studied Judaism, Jewish history, the Holocaust and Israel. They also toured Israel.

The course was set up by Yad Vashem after it became known that the Auschwitz guides were unaware that most of the death camp's victims were Jews.

Jordanian Kids Arrive

JERUSALEM — More than a dozen children and their escorts became the first Jordanian tourists to visit Israel last Monday. They were guests of the annual Festigal Chanukah show in Haifa.

WORLD

Antonescu Statue

BUCHAREST — Another statue of World War II fascist dictator Ion Antonescu has been dedicated in Romania, the World Jewish Congress has reported.

The latest bust of Antonescu was unveiled last month in the Romanian town of Piatra-Neamt, at a ceremony attended by local officials and war veterans.

Jews in Romania, fearful of renewed anti-Semitism in the country, are concerned the dictator's reputation is being rehabilitated.

During Antonescu's rule from 1940 to 1944, more than 250,000 Jews died in territories controlled by Romania. Antonescu was executed in Romania as a war criminal in 1946.

In October 1993, Romania's first official statue of Antonescu was erected in the town of Slobozia, financed in part by local police.

Righteous Slovaks

PRAGUE — The Israeli ambassador to the Czech Republic recently bestowed a posthumous Righteous Among the Nations Award to a couple who gave refuge to three Jews in a Slovak village during World War II.

At a ceremony at the Israeli embassy here, Ambassador Moshe Yegar delivered the award to Ruzena Stepnickova, the daughter of Vojtech and Anna Mjartus, who risked their lives to hide in their home three Jews pursued by the Nazis.

Jeffries: Jews 'Stink'

NEW YORK — Leonard Jeffries, whose anti-Semitic remarks several years ago cost him his job at City College here, has taken another swing at Jews, saying they are like skunks and have "stunk up everything."

According to the New York Daily News, Jeffries told his cheering audience in a recent speech in New Jersey, "you have to have peace with these skunks, so they don't stink you all up."

Recordings of the speech were said to be on sale in Harlem.

Jeffries, a tenured professor who espoused unusual racial theories, lost his position as chair of the Black Studies Department at City College after a 1991 speech in which he accused Jews of financing the slave trade and portraying blacks negatively in movies.

Jeffries has sued to recover his position. He won his bid in two lower courts, including a federal appellate court.

JCC files proposals to creditors

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After months of negotiations, court appearances and dispute resolution, it looks as if there's finally a light at the end of the tunnel in which the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has found itself for the past few years.

Late last week the JCC filed a proposal to its creditors that is expected to satisfy their claims and allow the JCC to restructure itself.

The offer would see all the JCC's creditors paid in full, the Leah Posluns Theatre (LPT) endowment fund replenished and terminated employees paid in excess of statutory requirements.

The proposal must still be accepted by creditors representing two-thirds of the value of the outstanding claims and then be approved by court.

Although the proposal was filed by the JCC, "it obviously does not have the financial wherewithal to make this proposal without the help of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto," said Robert Harlang, spokesman for Richter & Partners, the court-appointed receiver.

Under the terms of the proposal, the Federation will be the primary source of funds to help the JCC pay off its debts, which total more than $16 million.

The proposal has the Bank of Montreal (BMO), which is owed $9.1 million (plus interest and other charges), receiving $4.5 million on closing of the deal, expected in January or February 1995. At closing, the JCC's Bloor and Valley properties will be sold to member groups and the Bathurst facility will be transferred to a new corporate group.

The Bloor facility will provide $3 million to the bank, and the Valley will give $1 million. The company that takes ownership of the Bathurst facility, called 4588 Bathurst Centre, will pay the bank $600,000 over the next five years.

Other creditors slated to be paid in full are: Revenue Canada, $500,000; the trades, $1.2 million; terminated employees, $400,000; the LPT endowment fund and other endowment funds, $3.4 million.

Negotiations are ongoing with Honeywell, which has placed liens on the Bathurst and Bloor properties for debts of $990,000.

Negotiations ongoing with Honeywell

Under a formula contained in the proposals, the 31 LPT and JCC employees who were terminated and who had more than five years experience will receive one week's wages for every year of service, plus an enhancement of three per cent per year of service. The enhancement is not required by law, Harlang said.

In addition, employees with less than five years service, who, under the Employment Standards Act, would not be entitled to any severance package, will receive a minimum of five weeks' pay plus three per cent, he added.

Turning to the LPT endowment fund, Harlang said philanthropist Wilfred Posluns had applied to court several weeks ago to raise his

Metro man subject of anti-Semitic harassment

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A North York man and his family have become targets of a vicious campaign of anti-Semitic and life-threatening hate mail, and police appear powerless to do anything about it.

Transport Canada worker Ned Godfrey said he has been the victim of a harassment campaign that has included letters bearing large swastikas threatening his life and that of his family. One letter obtained by The CJN has a hand-drawn swastika, Godfrey's address and the words, "Dead F...in Jew."

Another letter, in child-like handwriting, states "will (sic) get rid of all the f...ing Jews in this area but you Ned Godfrey will be the first dead f...ing Jew. You can count on this [epithet]."

Godfrey says the harassment dates back to late 1990. Incidents include flyers advertising a non-existent party at his home, people arriving at his home seeking drugs, and three instances where a firearm was discharged in the neighborhood.

The neighborhood has been subjected to a number of wild, all-night parties where party-goers urinated on front lawns and where patio tables in Godfrey's backyard were wrecked.

Godfrey said after he complained to police and a neighbor was charged with assault in March 1993, he began receiving anti-Semitic material, with the most recent arriving this past September. He has called police, informed Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, asked city councillors for help and taken his case to the the media.

No one seems able to offer any permanent relief and Godfrey, a soft-spoken individual, admits his life has become a virtual nightmare. Friends and his doctor have recommended that he sell the house he has occupied since 1984.

Metro Councillor Norm Gardner said he took up the case at Godfrey's request, discussing it with police at 33 Division. "They have no evidence to lay charges at anybody. They see it as a neighbors' squabble," Gardner said.

Police "have a lot of difficulty proving where [the letters] came from, but they did put a lot of police manpower into the case. It wasn't as though it was a cavalier attitude," he said

CJC spokesman Steven Shulman said Congress became involved because "the letters contain clear, offensive statements of anti-Semitism that no one should be subjected to."

Congress has "contacted as many people as possible who could make a difference," including the police force's hate crimes unit. Det. Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave, who heads the unit, told The CJN the investigation is in the hands of the local police, and the hate crimes unit is monitoring their progress.

Sgt. Lino Murarotto, a community relations spokesman for 3 District, which takes in most of North York, said police have been involved with the case for about four years. "A sizable file has developed" but so far, "we just don't have enough evidence to proceed with any charges," he said.

Although police see it is as a neighbors' dispute, the anti-Semitic aspect "has elevated it to a higher status," Murarotto said.

Forensic investigations of the letters have failed to turn up fingerprints and repeated police surveillance of the neighborhood has revealed nothing. All the police can do now is maintain increased patrols.

"We cannot provide 24-hour protection to Godfrey and his family," Murarotto said.

Willowdale MPP Charles Harnick said his office has contacted a property developer to see if they could exercise more control over tenants occupying a house in the neighborhood.

But Steven Ruse, general manager of Tocana Management, the company which administers the property for the owner, a numbered company, said: "The landlord has not had any problems with the tenants and we have not had any complaints with regard to these tenants in recent months."

He acknowledged there were problems with one tenant in the past, but that was rectified more than a year ago when the tenant left.

Ruse said "our company at no times condones racial prejudice or hate literature dissemination" and will "co-operate 100 per cent" in any police investigation.

While law enforcement authorities and politicians spin their wheels, Godfrey has been forced to take medication to calm his frayed nerves. He has finally decided to put his house on the market, but so far there have been no takers.

"The damage they've done will never be cured," he said. "It's been a nightmare, like a cancer growing. I have to look behind my back when I go to work, when I take out the garbage. . . Are we back in Nazi Germany?"

Atlantic Jew launches scholarship

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Norman Newman never had the chance to visit Israel, but this October his widow Barbara did for the first time.

After Norman died in December 1993, Barbara wanted to do something concrete in Israel to memorialize him.

"What she did was a breakthrough for Atlantic Canada UIA," said Reuven Rosenfelder, the Israel-based director of communications for UIA Canada. He said her contribution for a single project in Israel "sets a new standard for giving in the Atlantic region."

The establishment of the $250,000 Barbara and Norman Scholarship Fund will help 15- to 18-year-olds in the upper Galilee region attend Migal Research Institute or Tel Hai Regional College.

Barbara Newman

"I was a high school teacher and guidance counselor and always interested in education," said Newman. "I wanted to support a project dealing with bright young minds in Israel."

She visited the Migal Institute during the eight-day mission and knew "that was where I wanted to direct my donation."

Interest from the $250,000 donation will be matched by UIA for the next five years, and maybe 10, she said. The money will provide multiple scholarships.

The mission was attended by 16 community leaders from Atlantic Canada. "We were impressed with what had been accomplished in Israel where enormous problems have been faced and dealt with effectively," Newman said. "Now that I've been there, any news item I read or see will make me more interested in what is happening and give me greater understanding. I will definitely go back."

Norman Newman was a successful Halifax businessman who served on the boards of many business and arts organizations, including Dalhousie University, Symphony Nova Scotia and Shaar Shalom Synagogue. He was also a major benefactor of the Art Gallery of Nova Scotia.

Nerve research gets $1M boost

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto philanthropist has given $1 million for neurosurgical and neuroscience research at the University of Toronto and the Toronto Hospital.

Leslie Dan, chair and CEO of the pharmaceutical company Novopharm, was on hand at the Nov. 28 inauguration of the Dan Family Chair in Neurosurgery, held at the home of university president Robert Prichard.

Dr. Charles Tator, 58, is the chair's first incumbent.

The $2-million chair, jointly shared by the university and the hospital, will fund research into brain tumors, trauma, strokes and aneurysms.

Toronto Hospital president Dr. Alan Hudson, himself a neurosurgeon, told The CJN the Dan family donation is a "terrific stimulus" to research in the city.

"They asked for [$1 million] and I didn't say no. They needed it," Dan later told The CJN.

Tator, who like Dan belongs to North York's Reform Temple Emanu-El, will hold the chair for four years.

The U of T's division of neurosurgery, of which Tator is head, trains 30 residents and 20 fellows at six affiliated hospitals. The Toronto Hospital's 10-member neurosurgical staff is the largest in Canada.

The inauguration was preceded by a Chanukah candlelighting led by Dan's son, Dr. Michael Dan, currently a staff neurosurgeon at New Orleans' Charity Hospital, and his wife Camille.

The younger Dan will become Novopharm's medical director this June.

Prichard later confirmed it was the first chanukiah lighting held at the university's Rosedale mansion during his tenure.

The Dan family's other charitable bequests include a $1-million gift to the $5-million Leo Baeck Day School Dan Family Building, and $1.2 million towards the $2-million Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre, to be begun this Sunday in Thornhill.

Liberal MPs learn about Israel during CIC trip

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A delegation of Liberal MPs returned last month from a Canada-Israel Committee (CIC)-sponsored trip impressed with the direction Israel is now taking.

According to CIC public affairs director Philippe Elharrar, who led the Nov. 7-13 trip with Shimon Fogel, CIC director of governmental affairs, the trip was an unqualified success.

"They met with new immigrants; they saw a lot," he said. "They understand Israel's raison d'etre."

Elharrar said the sites visited by the Liberal MPs — who included party whip Don Boudrias, Shaughnessy Cohen, Bonnie Hickley, Dr. Rey Pagtakhan, Gerry Pickard and Jane Stewart — included areas over the Green Line, like the West Bank, Jerusalem's Old City and the Golan Heights.

But according to Elharrar, the embassy did not ask that the MPs travel with a "neutral" Canadian escort over the Green Line because the trip was "private."

The Liberal MPs, Elharrar said, were accompanied at all times by either David Oren or Aliza Belman, who work for Israel's Foreign Ministry.

The only time that the embassy asked for a Canadian presence, Elharrar said, was when the group met with Palestinian representatives.

The MPs also visited a Druze village, an Israeli kibbutz and immigrant absorption facilities, as well as Yad Vashem and Masada.

They also participated at briefing sessions with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and a cross-section of Israeli MKs, including Tamar Gozansky (of the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality), Naomi Blumenthal (Likud), Walid Sadik (Meretz), Eliezer Sandberg (Tsomet) and Avigdor Kahalani (Labor).

The MPs, all of them on their first trips to Israel and some of whom were accompanied by their spouses (who paid their own way), also met with academics, Raphael Goren, external relations director for the Centre for Interntional Cooperation, former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg, Jerusalem Report managing editor David Orivitz and Kamal Mansour, advisor to president Ezer Weizman on minority affairs.

Canadian ambassador Norman Spector also hosted a reception for the Liberal MPs at his home.

"I think they were surprised by the country," Elharrar said, "by the booming economy, the development.

"I also think they understand better the price of negotiations."

As part of its lobbying efforts, the CIC has for several years organized periodic trips to Israel for Canadian politicans.

Earlier this year, a group of Bloc Quebecois MPs went on a CIC trip. Elharrar said efforts are underway to organize a trip for Reform Party MPs next June.

CIC MEETS WITH RABIN

During Prime Minister Rabin's visit to Canada, leaders from the Canada Israel Committee attended a lunch hosted by Canadian Foreign Minister Andre Ouellet which was followed by a private briefing. Shown above (from left) are CIC officers Sheldon Lerman, Norman Godfrey, Prime Mnister Rabin, Stephen Victor and Stephen Lipper. Also in attendance was B'nai Brith Canada president Brian Morris, Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella and CZF representative Stella Torontow.

Why Benjamin's?

Some differences matter more than others when funeral arrangements have to be made. One is being able to talk to a funeral director who is Jewish, for the depth of understanding and the 'feel' for tradition.

Another contrast at Benjamin's is the many years' experience of staff who supervise proceedings to the minutest detail.

On the other hand, there's usually very little difference in cost between chapels. Regardless. The price for identical products and services may vary slightly, but there's no comparison in quality.

According to families who have experienced it firsthand, these differences mean everything.

Warning sounded over right's influence

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The extreme right is subtly influencing the political agenda in Europe, North America and the former Soviet Union, according to the authors of a draft study sponsored by the Institute for International Affairs, an agency of B'nai Brith Canada.

The Extreme Right: International Peace and Security at Risk, was presented at a seminar in Ottawa last week. The report details trends in racism, anti-Semitism, nationalism and right-wing violence in several countries. It concludes that although membership in extreme-right groups is relatively low, the groups have influenced the debate about refugee policy and immigration, gay rights and abortion.

Research and interviews were conducted in Canada, the United States, England, Wales, France, Hungary, Russia, Poland and Germany.

In Canada, the extreme-right numbers a few hundred members, said Stephen Scheinberg, a co-author of the study and a professor at Concordia University. Nevertheless, violent skinhead gangs are active in every major Canadian city.

Scheinberg says the American extreme-right is poised to move into Canada by attaching itself to moderate movements. For example, the radical anti-abortion group Human Life International plans to hold its international convention in Montreal in April. Group founder and president Father Paul Marx has singled out Jewish doctors, Jewish feminists and Jews in the media as leaders in the abortion field.

Among other observations from the study:

* A 1994 public opinion poll in Poland found that 36 per cent of those polled believed Jews have too much influence, despite there being only 8,000 Jews in a country with a population of 40 million.

* In Russia, right-wing organizations and publications are thriving. Leaders exploit a feeling among the majority that the average citizen is a victim of the country's political transformation. "The growing xenophobia and demonization of ethnic minorities and refugees, compounded by a lack of respect for human rights, threatens not just those targeted groups, but democracy itself in Russia," says Aurel Braun, a professor of international relations and political science at the University of Toronto, who wrote the chapters about Russia, Poland and Hungary.

* In France, the popularity of the extreme right party, the Front Nationale, has influenced national policy. Refugee claimants have lost the right to work, and local mayors, who might belong to the party, now have the authority to decide whether a foreigner can marry a French national.

However, even as public policy moves to the right, governments are also clamping down on racist activities. In England, the law against incitement to racial hatred has been strengthened, says David Matas, a Winnipeg immigration lawyer and president of the Canadian Council for Refugees who researched the extreme right in France and the United Kingdom for the study.

In France, anti-racist organizations have joined forces to launch civil suits against those who have committed racially motivated crimes.

Canada's Parliament is reviewing legislation that would see harsher sentences for crimes motivated by hate.

The B'nai Brith study is part of an ongoing 16-month research project funded by the Cooperative Security Competition Program of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, the Department of Canadian Heritage and the B'nai Brith Foundation.

A final report will be released following seminars in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg.

Surrealistic spectacle

Later this week, on Dec. 10, a committee of the Norwegian parliament will confer the Nobel Peace Prize for 1994 on Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat. It will be as surrealistic a spectacle as any painted by Salvador Dali. Things will seem out of place. The imagery will be grotesque and even disturbing.

The incongruity in the choice of Arafat was missed by four of the five members of the selection committee. Apparently they felt no personal misgivings at choosing the planner of the massacres of Munich and Maalot to be worthy of the Nobel award. Or if they did, the burden of their responsibility was too great to straighten their stooped and bowed backbone into a posture of rectitude and integrity.

Irrespective of the worthiness of Rabin or Peres as recipients, the instability and uncertainty of the current situation makes this year's peace prize quite premature. There is as much chaos in Gaza as order. Killing continues unchecked. In most Gazan mosques, the sermon is hatred towards Jews. The Palestinian National Authority appears incapable of reigning in the forces of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, and at times unwilling do so. In the territories the devolution of self-rule proceeds very slowly.

The inclusion of Yasser Arafat makes the prize particularly inappropriate. Regrettably, only one member of the selection committee had the conscience and rare courage to express this. Kare Kristiansen, a former cabinet minister in the Norwegian government, resigned from the committee, stating that Arafat had "too much blood on his hands."

The majority of the committee ignored the deep red stain. They felt that the chairman of the PLO had "transcended his past." But until Arafat rises to the urgent challenges of the present, an expedient signature and a publicity-bonanza handshake on a sun-soaked day in Washington will not be sufficient to dispel the doubts which linger surrounding his "transcendence."

It may be that the committee thought to boost the fragile peace by focussing the international spotlight on Arafat and on the sputtering negotiations through the light and the credibility of the rare Nobel occasion. We commend the committee's motive — namely, to do their part to ensure that this tenuous process of peace between Israeli and Palestinian, yet early in its gestation, is neither aborted, nor stillborn. But we regret their method. Both the light and the credibility of the prize have now been diminished.

Unlike the canvasses of Dali which hang permanently on display in some of the most famous art galleries around the world, the spectacle in Oslo will be noticed only once, celebrated by few, then consigned to a dark corner of our memory.

Computer hate

It was the Psalmist who said that the "wicked spring up like the grass," in reference to the proliferation of evil in ancient societies.

Today the frequency of its appearance has not changed but its medium has. One aspect of computer technology has now become a major vehicle for the dissemination of evil.

Chad Skelton, a media researcher, indicates in a recent study (Id Magazine. Oct. 6) that various bulletin board systems (BBS) have become the foyer for racial hatred, religious bigotry, anti-Semitism and Holocaust revisionism.

In the United States alone there are 11 different BBS devoted to spreading hate. Because the much publicized Internet, the world's larget computer network, is a collection of computers rather than a single computer network, it is virtually ungovernable. It has, therefore, attracted a phalanx of anti-Semites who, on the dark side of cyberspace, ply their squalid trade.

As Internet becomes more and more widespread, purveyors of hatred have become more subtle in their advocacies. Thus one group which calls itself Cyberspace Minutemen, appeals to men and women to preserve their "North European culture, Nordic ideals and freedom of speech and association."

The Jewish community, one of the major targets of the BBSs, has not been sufficiently alerted to the threat posed by electronic hate literature because it has become fixated on the hard copy variety.

The magnitude of the assault against Jews, Judaism and Israel on BBS warrants an immediate response because so many of those involved in using BBS are young impressionable people. Often their first contact with hatred towards Jews comes through the computer.

Letters to the editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

NOT REFORM'S FAULT

Your editorial of Nov. 17 again shows your bias against the Reform party.

If the Liberal party is proposing changes to our immigration policy, obviously it is Reform's fault that it does not meet your idea of what the policy should be. The Bloc Québécois and Conservatives would agree with most of it, but forget about that, let's blame Reform.

The policy you are referring to does not apply to refugees. For the others, why should we not allow immigrants who can speak one of our languages in preference to others that can't? If they really want to come here, preference should be given to those that put the effort into learning our language(s). Quebec has been applying that policy for years and you seem to accept that. Why can't Canada do so as well?

I guess pandering to the public occurs when the vast majority want something and the politician does so. I call that democracy — doing what the majority wants done.

JEWS IN BELGIUM

A sentence in Cynthia Gasner's article about the Peretz family (CJN Nov. 24) gives a sadly erroneous view of Jewish survival in Belgium: "There were more than 30,000 Jews in Belgium at the beginning of the war. Only a handful survived."

From authoritative sources, such as Le Comité de Défense des Juifs en Belgique by Lucien Steinberg, here are the most accepted figures:

In 1939, there were close to 90,000 Jews in Belgium. That included several thousand recent refugees from Germany and Austria.

About 20,000 were trapped in France after trying to escape the advancing German armies. Many of them were interned and about 7,000 were later deported.

As of October 1941, 57,000 Jews had been identified by the German authorities in Belgium, largely as a result of compliance with the registration order issued a year earlier by the Agence Juive Belge. An estimated 12,000 Jews did not register.

The total number of Jews who had survived in Belgium by the end of the war would then be about 45,000. That includes over 3,000 hidden children.

Belgium was an exceptional country in its attitude to Jews, providing, despite some collaborators, a basically friendly and compassionate environment. The other reason for the high survival rate was the Jewish Resistance. Its main body, the Comité de Défense des Juifs en Belgique, aided by two smaller groups, counted close to 1,000 men and women in its ranks, of whom 250 paid with their lives. Underground papers, in Yiddish and French, were disseminated throughout the entire war. False I.D. cards, stamps for rationed foods and actual cash were distributed to hidden people in heroic cloak and dagger operations.

BELIEF IN AFTER LIFE

In the Letters of Nov. 24, Rabbi Abraham Cohen questions views imputed to me, which he gleaned from The CJN report on Nov. 3.

I presume that Rabbi Cohen did not hear my actual remarks, and is reacting to the context of the written word.

It is obvious that belief in afterlife is important in Judaism. Clear statements to this effect in the Talmud are enough evidence, as is the additional rationale offered by Rabbi Cohen.

But this does not make belief in afterlife a major concern. The major concern in Judaism has always been the here-and-now. "Better is one period of repentance and good deeds in this world than all of life of the world to come" (Talmud, Avot, 4:22).

REPLY 45 YEARS LATE

Allan Peters, a U.S. Army Lieutenant, was the commandant of the captured town of Waidring in 1945. He met seven Polish Jewish teenager boys. One of these boys, Michael Cherny whose last known address was 705 Manning Avenue in Toronto, wrote to Mr. Peters on December 22, 1949. Unfortunately at the time Mr. Peters didn't respond, which he regrets.

He would like very much to get in touch with Cherny or to find out his whereabouts.

DELAYS EXACERBATE PROBLEMS

Would-be peacemakers prematurely rewarded?

By Yeshayahu Anug

For many here in Israel and in the outside world the improbable handshakes of over a year ago in Oslo and Washington represented the triumph of courage over hopelessness. I looked at my columns from the months following these events; soon after the celebrations, they started registering the growing opposition to peace in both camps and the fluctuating moods of the peacemakers under the attack of the opposition and the assault of Hamas terrorism.

Now, as last year's commitment to peace between Israel and the Palestinians is being rewarded by the most cherished prize statesmen can aspire to, the Nobel Peace Prize, the peace process itself is running out of steam. Confronted by reality, the chief protagonists seem to be losing their self-confidence as well as many of their supporters.

Yet, while the momentum for peace in the Middle East has slowed down considerably, efforts to pacify the region are continuing. U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher returned to inject life into the stagnating trilateral contacts with Syria.

Hafez al-Assad will probably reassess the disposition and the stamina of the U.S. administration, before deciding if the time has come for him to show some flexibility in response to whatever incentives Washington can now offer. His country is still on the U.S. list of "terrorist states," but last week it received a morale booster from the European Union, which for reasons of its own has lifted its nine-year-old arms embargo on Syria.

The practical consequences of this gesture are limited. It was an act of defiance by the Europeans at a time when the U.S.-European relationship is in crisis over many issues, principally the handling of the war in Bosnia. The European self-assertion vis a vis Syria is meant to signal to the Americans, and also to the Israelis, that Europe cannot be expected to merely finance the costs of peace in the Middle East, if it is not allowed to play a more active role in the political aspects of the peace talks.

With different considerations in mind, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's government too will watch the current Syria-U.S. contacts carefully to see what is emerging from Damascus that could justify a moderation of its own attitude to Syria. Although the Golan issue stands in the way of any progress in the uneasy dialogue with Assad, he still holds the master-key to Israeli-Lebanese normalization.

For now, Syria tolerates a measure of Iran-inspired Hezbollah activity against Israel, but could curb it any time if Israel agreed to discuss withdrawal on the Golan Heights. The security aspects of a Syrian-Israeli settlement are still undefined and the government hesitates to confront the Golan settlers and their strong lobby. It points at Assad's failure to earn credibility in Israel as to his ultimate intentions.

In sharp contrast to the negotiations with the Palestinians and Syrians, the peace with Jordan already shows signs of vitality. Groups of private Israeli tourists, who now visit Jordan, are well received there and enjoy the new experience. A trickle of organized Jordanian groups, officials, business people and even Jordanian schoolchildren, have started coming to Israel. And as diplomatic relations have already been established, the two ambassadors are to present their credentials in Jerusalem and Amman next week. The precise timetable of normalization is working. Will it be affected by what happens in the other sectors?

Between one peace celebration and another, the government here is, as mentioned above, running out of ideas on how to go on. Rabin's rhetoric is tough and quite confusing. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres's grand designs for a booming Middle East have also lost much of their magic. The opposition needs no imagination to harass the government. It only has to point at Arab terrorism to discredit the government's policies. And, in fact, since the Oslo agreement of 1993, Hamas terrorism has murdered a hundred Israelis, both soldiers and civilians.

If the negotiations with the PLO on the interim automomy period are to make any progress, Israel will have to find a way to re-deploy its forces in the territories, so that Palestinian elections can be held there without their presence, as the agreement demands. This will inevitably affect the safety of the Jewish settlements. The problem could be minimized by the evacuation of the most isolated and exposed ones, by the relocation of others in existing, defensible clusters, while a smaller third category would have to chose between dissolution and Palestinian jurisdiction.

It seems that in its present precarious situation, PLO acquiescence to such a scheme (which would entail a significant loss of autonomous territory) could be obtained more easily than that of the settlers. For understandable reasons of internal stability, Rabin still hesitates to openly confront the explosive subject.

But if he continues to stall on the issue, there will be little progress in the forthcoming talks with the PLO and more turbulence among the Palestinians. On the other hand, even if the wisest policy is adopted, the preparation of a new infrastructure of roads to separate the two populations will mean many months of public works and enormous costs to the Israeli taxpayer. And most importantly, before all that can start, a decision must be taken and none is yet in sight.

Israeli and Jordanian politicians cross the new border point between their two countries.

Arafat's incompetent cronies give boost to Hamas

By NECHEMIA MEYERS
Special to The CJN

Dutch journalist Caroline de Gruyter isn't surprised by the growing strength of Hamas in the Gaza Strip, where she has lived with her hydrologist husband for the last few months.

As she tells both readers of the Amsterdam newsmagazine Elsevier and Israelis she meets, Arafat is responsible for Hamas successes. This is because the self-styled president of Palestine has surrounded himself with too many incapable and corrupt officials who arrive at work late, enjoy a leisurely lunch and, in some cases, then embark upon drinking sprees.

There are, de Gruyter hastens to add, plenty of well-educated and dedicated PLO supporters in the Gaza Strip whom Arafat could have appointed to senior positions, but, for the most part, he has not done so.

As a result of PLO ineptitude and corruption, the Dutch newslady goes on, Hamas has gained considerable support from elements of the Gaza population who by no means favor Islamic fundamentalism. They back Hamas because it is the only large movement that strenuously opposes the PLO and because its own institutions — like clinics and schools — are well run.

According to de Gruyter, "overseas agencies know that $10,000 given to PLO institutions may simply disappear, while the same $10,00 given to those of Hamas is used to fund their activities."

While most Israelis see Hamas as a single, extremely dangerous entity, de Gruyter speaks of an organization split down the middle. On the one hand, she says, there are the old-timers, whose single goal is a war to the death with Israel, which, they declare, has no place in the Muslim Middle East. On the other hand, again according to the Dutch journalist, there are younger Hamas members who favor negotiations with the Jews about a two-state solution, albeit on terms that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin — let alone Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu — would never accept.

Pursuing her thesis about "moderate Hamas elements," de Gruyter claims "they have learned the lesson of Iran, namely that not even a devoutly Islamic nation can afford to turn its back on Western culture. Their aim," she says, "is simply to create a Muslim alternative to communism and capitalism, both of which, as they see it, have failed to emancipate the people."

The Dutch lady, who is clearly an outsider in Gaza, finds no difficulty communicating with the Palestinians, "who are anxious to talk to journalists." At the same time, she is careful to take their sensibilities into consideration. So, for example, when she goes to interview someone at the Islamic University, a fundamentalist stronghold, she wraps herself in black from head to toe. "The only thing I refuse to do," she adds with a smile, "is to wear gloves."

As de Gruyter sees it, the future of the Gaza Strip and of the emerging Palestinian entity depends on whether Arafat gets his act together, whether he appoints competent administrators and stops trying to make all the decisions himself. "Today," she notes, "he even decides who is to have telephones in the Strip!"

Should things improve, she predicts that Hamas will remain with its hard core of supporters, "who make up less than 20 per cent of the population. If, however, the chaos and corruption go on, Hamas will continue to grow."

Opinion

A remarkable story of success

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

A few days ago in the Toronto Globe and Mail I read a little story which was printed next to the customary obituary notices. I was shocked to see it, because the one who was eulogized was someone whom I had admired and who had died at the young age of 54.

When she was a little girl she was stricken with double pneumonia that brought her to death's door, a bout followed immediately by a severe case of scarlet fever.

When finally she recovered from these double onslaughts she contracted polio, for which no cure had as yet been invented. As it was, the case was relatively mild and eventually she could walk again with a brace on her left leg. When she was nine years old, this contraption was replaced by a high-top shoe, allowing her a fairly normal gait. But of course she could neither jump nor run.

Still, she had a dream. She was always entranced by those who were fleet of foot and had often thought of herself as a potential champion athlete. Polio seemed to have ended the realization of this dream — except for the fact that this little girl had guts, stamina and will. She managed to join her high school's basketball team and to everyone's surprise became its leading scorer. She had not, however, forgotten about her dream.

She had practised running secretly and when she was 15 years old she entered a major American track event. She won it and not long thereafter made the U.S. Olympic squad. In 1956 she was a member of the 400-metre relay team which won the bronze medal.

Her great moment came four years later at the Olympics in Rome. She won the gold medal in the 100-metres and tied the world record. She also won the 200-metre sprint setting an Olympic record. Then, with three of her team mates from Tennessee State University, she anchored the 400-metre team which finished in world record time.

Ollan Cassell, executive director of U.S.A. Track and Field called her "the greatest" and compared her to Jesse Owens — but perhaps it should be the other way around.

Upon leaving the field of sports she became a United States ambassador, starred in a network radio show and held corporate positions. She wrote an autobiography which was made into a film.

If by this time you have not as yet guessed who this lady was — she was Wilma Rudolph.

When I read about Ms. Rudolph, I remember admiring her magnificent stride, imprinted on my mind after all these many years. And I thought that in many ways she, who was not Jewish, nonetheless represented something that we Jews have always known.

Theodor Herzl expressed it perfectly in his motto to his book The Jewish State: "If you will it, it is no dream.

Bosnian kids unite adversaries

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Can Israelis and Palestinians really work together in peace and understanding?

A unique joint project, which is helping five wounded Bosnian children get back on their feet, furnishes proof that people on both sides can put aside their differences for the good of others.

Initially conceived by the Jewish community of Sarajevo, which first brought the plight of the young Muslim children to the attention of international aid workers, the project in the West Bank town of Beit Jala has begun to heal wounds between Israelis and Palestinians as well.

The participants have worked together in the past — sending shipments of food and medicine to Bosnia in cooperation with the World Conference on Religion and Peace — but the latest venture marks the first time that Israelis and Palestinians have provided joint humanitarian aid on their own soil.

The project, which has been a year in the making, is helping to rehabilitate five youths — ages 10 to 17 — all of whom sustained serious injuries during the war that has rocked their nation.

Four of the youth are amputees; one girl is partially paralyzed after sustaining a back injury.

Unable to receive the care they needed in the war-devastated Bosnian capital of Sarajevo, the children and their mothers were evacuated by French United Nations peacekeeping forces. The fathers were forced to stay behind, since no men of army age are permitted to leave Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Upon their arrival in Israel earlier this year, the group settled into a guest house at Neveh Shalom, a mixed community of Israeli Arabs and Jews located west of Jerusalem.

The children were transported each day at the Sheba Hospital at the Tel Hashomer government medical center in Ramat Gan, where they received extensive medical treatment and, ultimately, prostheses to replace arms or legs.

The second stage of their recovery is now taking place at the Bethlehem Arab Society for Rehabilitation, a state-of-the art rehabilitation center located in Beit Jala, a predominantly Christian Arab town on the West Bank, not far from Jerusalem.

Too disabled and war-weary to indulge in games and laughter just weeks ago, the children are clearly making a fine recovery. Fitted with prostheses, they are now well enough to tour the West Bank and Jerusalem.

While the program's first priority is to heal the children's physical wounds through physiotherapy, Israeli and Palestinian professionals are also concerned with the youths' emotional well-being.

Edmund Shehadeh, director of the rehabilitation center, said the children "are suffering many problems as a result of their years in a war zone.

Israelis, Palestinians work together

"At first, they were extremely fearful, distrustful, and wouldn't cooperate," he said. "They suffer from sleeping problems and become frightened at loud noises. They also hide and store food, probably because they went hungry in Sarajevo."

All of the children are receiving psychological counseling, Shehadeh said.

Yoel Weinberg, Israel coordinator of the World Conference on Religion and Peace, noted that "although the kids seem very happy to be out of Sarajevo, they are anxious to return home to their fathers and siblings.

"In a way, it's very difficult," he said. "They and their mothers are so relieved to be out of the fighting, and they feel guilty for leaving others behind.

"After being in peaceful surroundings, it won't be easy for them to return home," he said.

Both Weinberg and Shehadeh stress that part of the healing process has been through example.

"One of our goals," Shehadeh said, "is to show the children that people who were once enemies can live in peace.

"These are Bosnian children, I am Greek Orthodox. Joel is a religious Jew. People from two different religions are working to help people of another religion. We need to teach by example, not just through preaching," he said.

As for relations between Israelis and Palestinians, Shehadeh said, "I am a great believer in the peace process, but I want to see a peace that promotes equal rights. I hope that this project is showing Palestinians that in any one given community or population, there are good people and bad people."

By cooperating, he said, "our two peoples can get to know and understand each other. By helping other people of war, the Palestinians are learning that there are other people in the world who are suffering.

"There is a lesson here," he added. "There are other people even more miserable than we are."

Thank heaven for little girls

When her parents went out of town for a week, our youngest granddaughter packed her prized possessions and moved in with us. It did not take long before we rediscovered that accommodating a live-in 2-year-old can be both an energizing and enervating experience.

Our granddaughter is an exceedingly lovable child. Her prevailing mood is effervescence. Her stream of questions never stops flowing. One minute she can be as simple and clear as pure water and in the next breath retreat into abstract language too cryptic to convey meaning to anyone.

The world is new to her every morning and almost everything in it interests her. She is sometimes exhausting but never inexhaustible — she never flags, she is relentless, never pausing for rest, rejuvenation or revival.

Her unbelievable reservoir of knowledge, comprehension and perception is astounding — as is her candor. One day, totally unrelated to the game we were playing, she looked at me and said, "Zaydie you write in the newspaper but you never write about us." Us, being all our granddaughters. She was acting as a surrogate for her older female cousins, who seemingly felt neglected when I wrote about our grandchildren on another occasion.

By Jack Chisvin

Talk about Jewish guilt. So Sara, Lisa, Rikki and Deborah, I write exclusively about "us." To state the obvious, our granddaughters are the most beautiful, the most intelligent, and most talented children on the face of the earth. I say this, not because it is expected of a biased grandparent, but because it is true. Truth of course is judged by its consequences not by its origin.

Our granddaughters have a propensity for laughter and joy and are naturally happy. They are cheerful, exuberant virtuosos of fanciful flights of the imagination: the twins, Sara and Lisa, counterweights on a balance beam; Rikki, the vicarious Princes Jasmine; and Deborah, the dilettante. To meet them is to be captivated by their warmth and engaging unique personalities.

Thank Heaven for little girls goes a popular song — "For little girls get bigger every day. Thank heaven for little girls; they grow up in the most delightful way." I don't know how our granddaughters' lives will unfold as they grow up, but for now they are delightful. While their mothers are wonderful role models, theirs will be a world with a more distant horizon for they were born in another time. What is certain is that having achieved equality, their orbit will encircle much more than just kuchen and kinder and they will be free to explore other uncharted space.

The most endearing moment spent with our granddaughters arrives every Friday, as the diminishing light of the day infuses the house with the tranquillity of the coming Shabbat. In the centuries-old tradition of Jewish women, our granddaughters gather around their Bubbie to light the candles and offer a benediction. It is a moment stopped in time.

The radiance of the flickering flames animate their angelic faces, and images of their foremothers, whose names they bear, come alive.

"Strength and honor are her clothing . . .
She openeth her mouth with wisdom . . .
Her children arise up, and call her blessed."

And I thank heaven, and all who dwell in it, for our little girls.

Karski — a Holocaust hero

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Heroes are few and far between, but Jan Karski surely qualifies as one. Karski, a Catholic, was a courier and a spokesman for the Polish underground and the government-in-exile during World War II. In 1942, after enduring both Soviet captivity and German torture, he escaped from Nazi-occupied Poland, embarking on a crusade to tell the world about a horrific event — the Holocaust.

Karski's heroic feat is not unknown. It has been noted in passing by historians. But with the publication of Karski: How One Man Tried To Stop The Holocaust (John Wiley & Sons, $24.95), the full story is finally told.

Written by Thomas Wood and Stanislaw Jankowski, Karski is an inspirational tale of courage and decency in the face of cruelty and incredulity. This absorbing biography confirms Karski's place as one of the "righteous among the nations."

Born in Lodz in 1914, the youngest of eight children, he was raised in a religious household where ethnic prejudice was frowned upon. From an early age, he maintained cordial relations with his Jewish neighbors.

An internship in the ministry of foreign affairs was interrupted by Germany's invasion of Poland on Sept. 1, 1939. Having recovered his wits, Karski set out on a tour of Nazi-occupied western Poland on behalf of the London-based Polish government-in-exile. There, he witnessed brutalities on a numbing scale against the Jewish population. He reported his findings to Stanislaw Kot, the government-in-exile's interior minister, who deliberately watered them down.

Eventually, Karski became a courier for the Home Army, the largest underground movement on Polish soil. He spent much of his time working for its Bureau of Information and Propaganda, whose task was to maintain close contact with the Jewish leadership of Poland.

In this capacity, Karski visited the Warsaw ghetto more than once. Jewish leaders, having told him that the Germans intended to exterminate Polish Jewry, gave him a rare opportunity to visit a Nazi death camp to see for himself.

Karski was taken to Izbica Lubelska, a town near Belzec, a camp which played an essential role in the murder of hundreds of thousands of Jews. There he saw unparalleled atrocities.

Meanwhile, the Bureau of Information and Propaganda had produced a roll of microfilm containing documents and letters attesting to the Final Solution, both in Belzec and in the Warsaw ghetto. In November 1942, Karski smuggled the incriminating evidence out of Poland to London.

As the authors correctly suggest, it was not the first report of Nazi crimes against humanity. A German industrialist had already informed the World Jewish Congress in Switzerland of Hitler's diabolical scheme to wipe out the Jews of Europe. However, his report had elicited skepticism in some quarters.

The reaction to Karski's revelations was different. Anthony Eden, Britain's foreign minister, said he had "little doubt that a policy of gradual extermination of all Jews... is being carried out by the German authorities."

On Dec. 17, 1942, Eden rose in the House of Commons and read the text of a joint Allied communique, approved by the governments of 11 nations at war with Germany. After reviewing the barbarities committed by Germany and denouncing its "bestial policy," Eden promised vengeance.

But, as Wood and Jankowski point out, Karski privately felt that the Allied statement fell short. It avoided promising that Jews who escaped the terror would be given sanctuary in Allied countries or in Palestine. It did not threaten reprisal bombings. The official Allied policy was that only victory could help the Jews, and that their suffering would not influence the military effort.

Jan Karski today

In the spring of 1943, Karski met with Ignacy Schwartzbart, a Polish-Jewish leader living in London. Karski told him he was "flabbergasted" by the Polish government's lack of understanding of the true nature of German policy.

Inspirational tale of courage, decency in face of cruelty

As recorded by Schwartzbart in his diary, Karski said: "I have to agree that there is a substantial difference between the sufferings of the Poles and the sufferings of the Jews. One can fittingly speak about the biological liquidation of the Polish intelligentsia, whereas you have to speak in relation to the Jews about the liquidation of a whole people."

During his travels abroad to publicize the ongoing Holocaust, Karski visited the United States. In Washington, he met with Justice Felix Frankfurter of the U.S. Supreme Court. Frankfurter, a Jew, expressed utter disbelief upon hearing Karski's chilling expose of Nazi atrocities.

Wood and Jankowski claim that the ostensible purpose of Karski's mission to the United States was not to sound an alarm about the Holocaust but to warn the Americans that Moscow was up to no good in Poland. They add that Karski raised the plight of European Jewry on his own initiative.

Karski brought his bleak message to the White House, having been granted an audience with President Franklin Roosevelt.

"There is a difference between the German-orchestrated systems of terror against the Poles and the Jews," he argued. "The Germans want to ruin the Polish state as a state... With regard to the Jews, they want to devastate the biological substance of the Jewish nation."

During the course of his American tour, Karski met with Jewish labor leaders, notably David Dubinsky of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union and Sidney Hillman of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union.

Karski heard complaints about anti-Semitism in the exiled Polish army and misgivings about the Polish government's commitment to equal rights in postwar Poland for Jewish survivors of the Holocaust.

In 1944, Karski wrote a book about his experiences, Story Of A Secret State, and excerpts were carried by such major magazines as Harper's Bazaar, Collier's and The American Mercury.

After the war, Karski's star waned. As the authors put it, "...he became just another European refugee, albeit a rather wealthy refugee."

Karski, we're told, was bitter that his efforts to stop the extermination of Jews failed. And he was haunted by the scenes of barbarism he had personally witnessed.

But through sheer will power, he forced the past out of his mind, promising himself that he would never again speak of the war unless there was a compelling reason to do so, and that he would remain silent about his experiences involving the Holocaust.

Content to live in the United States rather than in Communist-dominated Poland, Karski turned his attention to matters of the heart. He wed the daughter of a South American diplomat, but the marriage lasted only two years.

Picking up the pieces of his life, he enrolled at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service in Washington. After obtaining a PhD, he joined the faculty as a lecturer, a job he held from 1953 until his retirement in 1984.

In 1965, he remarried. The bride was a Polish Jewish woman, the dancer Pola Nirenska. Nine years later, having received a grant to write a book on Polish diplomacy, Karski visited Poland. In the late 1970s, he broke his vow of silence on the Holocaust when he agreed to appear in Claude Lanzmann's epic documentary, Shoah.

Karski and his wife travelled to Israel in June 1982 at the invitation of the Israeli government. At Yad Vashem, he planted a tree bearing his name, and was presented with a medallion recognizing him as a Righteous Gentile.

Last year, he returned to Poland once again, travelling in the company of U.S. Vice President Albert Gore to take part in commemorations of the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising.

In May of this year, in a ceremony at the Israeli embassy in Washington attended by President Bill Clinton, he was made an honorary citizen of Israel.

Fittingly enough, Karski ends there, leaving the impression that yet more accolades will be showered on this brave and concerned human being.

Mideast Analysis

By Sheldon Kirshner

Israel's quasi-alliance with the United States is sometimes taken for granted, as if it were pre-ordained. But, as Dan Raviv and Yossi Melman caution in Friends in Deed (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $34.95), a popular account of Israel's friendship with the United States, it has had its share of rocky moments.

Although President Harry Truman basically supported Jewish statehood, the U.S. State Department and Department of Defence were concerned that American identification with Israel would harm U.S. interests in the Middle East.

Despite pro-Arab sentiment at the highest levels of the American government, the United States was the first country to recognize Israel.

In 1951, the year David Ben-Gurion visited the United States for the first time in his capacity as prime minister, Israel put in a request for U.S. arms, but was rebuffed. Dwight Eisenhower viewed Israel through unsentimental eyes. During the 1956 Sinai crisis, he cut off all financial and technical assistance to Israel.

The Kennedy administration annoyed Israel with its proposals for the repatriation of Palestinian refugees and the monitoring of Israel's nuclear facility in Dimona.

Yet, Raviv and Melman write, John Kennedy was the first president to openly sell defensive arms to Israel, and to speak of a "partnership" between the United States and Israel.

Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Baines Johnson, was the first president to welcome an Israeli president to Washington. Better still, he raised U.S. aid to Israel dramatically, and sold Israel offensive military equipment — tanks and then aircraft.

Richard Nixon held private anti-Semitic views, but he considered Israel a strategic asset. During the Yom Kippur War, when Israeli supplies ran perilously low, he authorized an airlift of arms to Israel. Nixon's decision made the difference.

Yet another chill descended on U.S.-Israel relations when Israel's talks with Egypt on Sinai in 1975 broke down. The Ford administration's reaction was swift and brutal. Gerald Ford announced a "reassessment" of Washington's relationship with Jerusalem. Finally, Israel modified its terms for further withdrawals from the Sinai.

The chapter on the Carter administration's relations with Israel focuses on the 1978 Camp David Accords, which spawned Israel's historic peace treaty with Egypt.

Ronald Reagan assumed office as an outspoken friend of Israel. But due to a number of events — Israel's air raid on Iraq's nuclear reactor, its annexation of the Golan and its invasion of Lebanon — mutual relations suffered.

Raviv and Melman break new ground in their chapter on the 1991 Gulf War. They claim that the Bush administration reluctantly agreed that, if necessary, Israel could fire Jericho missiles at Iraq. However, they add, these missiles were not fully operational and, therefore, Israel did not have a ready option for an unmanned strike on Baghdad.

As might be expected, Friends in Deed is not only a readable chronicle of Israel's bilateral ties with the United States since the Truman presidency. The book also explores a whole range of issues, from Christian fundamentalists' links with Israel to pro-Israeli lobbying on Capitol Hill.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

I am writing this article on the first night of Chanukah, just days after Hashem blessed me with a grandson. The brit milah, G-d willing, will be in a few days. I would therefore like to try to combine all three — Chanukah, this week's parshah, Vayigash, and my personal simchah — in creating this article.

In this week's sidrah Yehuda says to Joseph while he is pleading for the return of Binyamin, "For how shall I go up go my father, and the lad is not with me?"

Commentaries have played with these Hebrew words to make them applicable to all of us, not words from Yehudah to Yosef referring to their father Yaakov Avinu. How shall we all go up, return after 120 years to our Father in Heaven, the Almighty, if the children are not with us — if we have not raised our sons and daughters to be Torah true Jews, faithful to the Torah and mitzvot?

There is a verse in Mishlei (Proverbs 17:6) that says: "The crown of grandparents are their grandchildren, and the glory of children is their parents." When explaining why Hashem chose Avraham Avinu as the great Patriarch Hashem says: "For I know him that he will command his children and household after him that they should keep the way of Hashem to do righteousness and justice . . ." (Breishis 18:19).

The commentaries generally offer two main reasons for the mitzvah of the brit milah, the covenant of circumcision. One is as Maimonides expresses it, "To weaken the physical desires of man," the other as Nachmanides expresses it, "To stamp the seal of Divinity on the flesh of man."

How different is ours from Greek culture. They deified the body and pursued hedonism. We agree the body must be kept healthy but only in order to be a proper vessel and vehicle for maintaining the soul, for being able to perform physical mitzvot, for serving Hashem.

The greatest physical act of mankind can lead to emulating the Creator: man can procreate and populate the world with sons and daughters who will recognize from whence they came, where they are going, and before Whom they will give a reckoning at the end of their days, as the mishnah in Avos states. On the other hand man can perform that great physical act and emulate the animals which also copulate and procreate from lust. The Jew sanctifies his physical acts, sublimates them to the spiritual and in so doing curbs the animal appetites.

The Jew is also proudly conscious that wherever he goes he carries this badge of Divinity with him, as King David remarked in the mikvah when he was deprived of fulfilling any other mitzvah. And is is precisely because this mitzvah was given as a reminder to weaken the lustful desires that it is a badge of Divinity.

The Greeks understood how this mitzvah of circumcision clashed with their definition of culture. Hence they targeted it as one of the three major observances to be eradicated from the practices of the Jews.

Thus Chanukah and the brit milah are very closely interconnected. The Maharal also explains that the number eight, in contrast to the number seven which signifies the natural (seven days of the week), indicates being above nature. Chanukah and brit milah raise us from the physical to the realm of the spiritual.

But it takes a Torah to teach us how to maintain that standard of life. Living as we do in the very real physical world, with all of its allurements and glittering desires, it is a real struggle to remain conscious of the higher purpose of creation. The mitzvah of honoring parents was placed on the first tablet between man and G-d. Because only if our parents and grandparents are faithful to Torah, and in turn we as their children and grandchildren are faithful to their teachings and our upbringing, will those golden links of tradition remain intact.

Becoming a zayde is a great blessing. To see one's offspring blessed in turn with their own fruits, perpetuating the family name and carrying on the generations, is truly a Divine gift. But it is also an awesome responsibility.

Whether I have been faithful to the task thrust upon me to raise my children as Torah true Jews, faithful to our heritage and all that it entails, will be demonstrated by seeing how my children successfully pass the test of raising their own children. Hence I am now burdened with a dual responsibility, which will hopefully result in a dual crown, for G-d-fearing grandchildren truly crown their grandparents.

May my grandson carry on the high standards of love for Torah learning and observance that I have tried to impart to my son. I am confident my son will be blessed with as much naches from his newborn as he has given to me. In this way we shall both, after 120 years, be able to return to our Heavenly Father and say proudly, "The lad is with me." Amen.

KRIEGSMAN — KRIEGER

I received an interesting letter from Vahn Pailakian, of Montreal, enquiring not about his unusual surname, but that of an American friend named Kriegsman. The suggestion is that since Kriegsman literally means a warrior or a quarrelsome person it is an odd name for any person to adopt.

The problem arises from a curious pronunciation of the German and Yiddish word Krug — which means a jug or a mug. Correspondingly, Kruger denotes an innkeeper who sold beer by the tankard. Krieger and Kriegsman are misspellings of Kruger.

My correspondent's surname is more difficult. It appears to emanate from a place name that attracted pelicans.

Ontario's Jackman sings praises of monarchy

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The monarchy received a public endorsement recently when Henry Jackman, lieutenant-governor of Ontario, took the podium at a gala dinner in his honor.

"We must always remember to separate individual peculiarities from institutional strength," Jackman told 400 people at the Inn on the Park Hotel, where he was presented with B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) 1994 Award of Merit.

Jackman referred only briefly to the "unwarranted fascination" with recent gossipy reports about the royal family.

"I believe, as I did prior to my assuming this post [representative of the Crown in Ontario], that the quality of life in Canada is different because of the traditions of the Crown. The Crown has given us our relevance as a nation," Jackman said.

"Whether the Crown is the cause or simply the symbol [of Canada's tolerance and distinctiveness] really makes no difference. To turn our backs on our symbols is to turn our backs on our history itself."

Jackman's speech, in which he also praised B'nai Brith for its outreach work beyond the Jewish community, was received with a standing ovation.

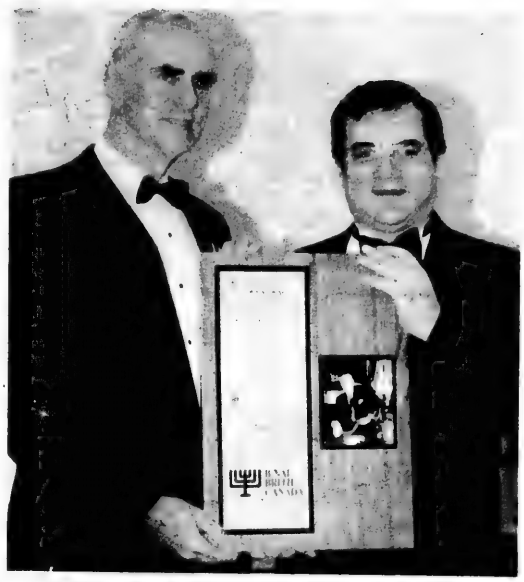
BBC president Brian Morris, who presented the award, said Jackman is "an outstanding leader in the Canadian community."

The lieutenant-governor, 62, "takes the values of industry, philanthropy, community service and volunteerism to all parts of this province," said Hugh Segal, dinner chair and former adviser to then-prime minister Brian Mulroney.

Prior to his appointment, Jackman "often spoke out in the defence of change and community responsibility," said Segal. Over two dozen charitable organizations have "benefited from his donation of time, resources and counsel as a board member."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of BBC, made a special presentation to Judy and Leslie Dan, who recently contributed $1 million to the B'nai Brith Foundation. BB's newest housing project at Finch and Torresdale Avenues will bear the name of the Dan family.

David Colodny, BBC financial management cabinet chair, and Pearl Gladman, BBC national director of field services, presided over a candlelighting ceremony.



B'nai Brith President Brian Morris (right) presents the 1994 Award of Merit to Henry Jackman, lieutenant-governor of Ontario.

Art Eggleton, president of the Treasury Board of Canada, and Anne Swarbrick, Ontario minister of Culture, Recreation and Tourism, brought greetings on behalf of Prime Minister Jean Chretien and Premier Bob Rae respectively.

Gabriel Nachman, BBC affordable housing chair and immediate past president, gave the invocation.

Sunnybrook Hospital to get Jewish chapel

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Sunnybrook Health Science Centre will soon have the first free-standing Jewish chapel in a Canadian hospital.

Toronto's Mt. Sinai Hospital has had a room for Jewish services since 1973.

Sunnybrook administrators and Jewish community leaders recently held a symbolic ground-breaking inside the 1,300-bed hospital, Toronto's second largest.

Chief operating officer Tom Closson and Rabbi Barry Schneider of the hospital's pastoral services joined in shovelling earth from the hospital grounds into a decorative container. A tree of life for the chapel will be planted inside the container.

The $330,000-chapel, due to be completed next June, is funded by the Jewish community and dedicated to the late Harvey Lister, a Jewish war veteran and a past president of the Steeles Memorial Chapel.

An extension of a small corner room in Synnybrook's H wing, the chapel will include a sanctuary for day and evening services, a library, a movable partition that can be used as a mechitzah, a rabbinic consultation room and a sukkah patio.

The chapel will be used for prayer, study and rabbinic counselling, but Rabbi Schneider said its most important function is to provide services for those who lose touch with the Jewish community because of disability or illness.

"We envision a sanctuary where we will have services continuously," he said. "We will be asking the different rabbis in our community to come, to bring with them volunteers ... and to conduct services."

Rabbi Schneider said it was important for veterans and patients to feel connected to their Jewish heritage. Sunnybrook was built in 1948 as a veterans' hospital.

Rabbi Schneider said hospital administrators were "enthusiastic" about building a Jewish chapel at Sunnybrook.

Rev. Alan Tipping, a United Church minister and hospital pastor, helped plan the Jewish chapel.

Rev. Tipping told The CJN the current "multi-purpose" chapel, which opened in 1950, is "really Christian," with stained-glass windows depicting Christian images. He said he hopes the Jewish chapel will be a place in which people of other faiths will learn more about Judaism by participating in discussion groups on subjects such as Jewish practices and what it means to be an observant Jew.

Sam Pasternak, the national commander of the Jewish War Veterans, said it is fitting that Jews and their non-Jewish comrades who fought side by side to defeat a common enemy also have their respective places of worship under the same roof.

Respective places of worship

"This place of worship, solace, prayer, comfort, meditation was nobly conceived and I'm certain that it will be nobly completed," said Pasternack. "While wars are a debaser of man and a destroyer of civilization, an edifice dedicated to our belief in the oneness and the glory of a living God brings out the nobility to which mankind can aspire, and occasionally, very occasionally, can reach."

Rabbi Schneider thanked Steeles Memorial Chapel for supporting the chapel, and the Brotherhood of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue for visiting patients and helping to raise funds to build the new chapel. He also thanked members of the General Wingate branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, who attended the ground-breaking in full uniform, for their visits with residents of the two veterans' wings at Sunnybrook.

IKEA urged to expand to Israel

Sweden that Kamprad had been a follower of Swedish fascist Per Engdahl. He also raised concerns that IKEA, which has eight stores in Canada, has complied with the Arab boycott.

Rabbi Cooper told The CJN Carstedt showed him IKEA documents indicating the company had received 84 requests in the last two years to open a store in Israel. IKEA's position is that it makes such decisions on purely economic grounds and that IKEA has received similar requests from 40-50 other countries.

But in light of Kamprad's past and considering that IKEA's products would be ideal for Israel's apartment lifestyle, Rabbi Cooper said that looking at a possible expansion to Israel would alleviate concerns about the company.

He pointed to a letter sent to him by a Toronto businesswoman, which stated that in the late 1970s she contacted IKEA about the possibility of opening a store in Israel. "The response was a curt and rather terse letter, informing us that IKEA had no desire to do business in Israel," she wrote.

The woman added that "every time I saw a new IKEA store open, I was reminded of that proposed business venture which met with a rather un-businesslike attitude."

Carstedt, who has been with IKEA for four years, told Rabbi Cooper he would check IKEA's corporate records to determine whether the company complied with the boycott. He was also expected to indicate early in the week whether IKEA will study the Israeli market for purposes of expansion.

"Our reaction to a boycott would be as severe even if there was no fascist connection," Rabbi Cooper said.

Engdahl, the fascist leader Kamprad admired as a young man, would have been a Swedish quisling if Nazi forces had occupied the country and would have turned over the country's Jews without losing a night's sleep, Rabbi Cooper said.

In a letter to his employees in the wake of Swedish media revelations about his past, Kamprad explains his ties to Engdahl. Tracing his background, Kamprad says his grandmother was a "Sudeten-German" whose "happiest day" came when the Czechoslovak-occupied Sudetenland was reunited with Germany in 1938.

As a youth in 1942, Kamprad attended meetings of the Engdahl movement and after the war, he met Engdahl on a couple of occasions. He also sold some of Engdahl's books, "mostly collections of poems," and published "a small political reference book written by Engdahl. I did this as a businessman to earn money only."

Kamprad said his association with Engdahl lasted into the 1950s. He attributed it to the influence of his grandmother and the mistakes of youth.

Rabbi Cooper said, "We've been told [Kamprad] does not harbor fascist views. We'll accept that but we expect him to be more forthcoming in condemning what Engdahl stands for. . . We want an explicit condemnation of what that man stood for."

Winnipeg teachers fight for paid religious holidays

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Encouraged by a Supreme Court decision last summer, Richard Swyston is leading a fight for paid religious holidays for non-Christian teachers in southeast Winnipeg.

Swyston is one of 10 Jewish teachers who work in the 550-teacher Fort Garry School Division. An elementary and special education teacher for 23 years, he is currently in his third term as president of the Fort Garry Teachers' Association.

The division's current policy is that non-Christian teachers can take days off for Rosh Hashanah, for example, or Ramadan for Muslims, but teachers have to pay for their substitutes or are docked pay. The Teachers' Association has given division school trustees until Dec. 8 to change the policy or face legal action.

As precedent, Swyston cites the recent Supreme Court ruling involving a Quebec school board and three Jewish teachers who successfully argued for paid leave for the High Holidays.

"Reaction has been swift with response in equal measure from those who agree and those who don't," Swyston said. "I have addressed every call."

The most frequent complaint, he said, is the concern about double holidays for the non-Christian teachers. Swyston's response is to point out that the Minister of Education determines when schools are to be opened and closed.

" 'If the minister ever opens the schools on Christmas and Easter, then ask me if I will work on those days,' I tell people who ask," he said. "We have no control over that."

Swyston has contacted the ministry and several Fort Garry school trustees have approached the Teachers' Association about negotiating days off.

"We are not ready to negotiate yet," Swyston said. "One non-Jewish, non-Christian teacher expressed a fear that the division may only hire Christian teachers if this passes. I have a lot of faith though in the people in the Superintendent's Department. They are honorable people."

If the case should proceed to court, however, Swyston has told Michael Werier of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council that the Fort Barry teachers will ask for a statement of support.

Scheininger seeks Liberal nomination

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Les Scheininger

TORONTO — Les Scheininger, a former national president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), has announced he will seek the provincial Liberal nomination in the Metro Toronto riding of Willowdale.

If he becomes the Liberal candidate in the next election, Scheininger will go head to head against Tory MPP Charles Harnick, a popular figure in the Jewish community.

Scheininger, a 47-year-old lawyer, is seeking the nomination against Gino Matrundola, who held Willowdale for the Liberals from 1987 to 1990, when he was defeated by Harnick.

A third candidate, Howard Shore, has dropped out of the race and will support Scheininger. Earlier this year, Shore's Markham house was defaced with swastikas and messages warning him to get out of the running. There have been no arrests in the case.

Harnick, the only Jewish MPP on the Conservative benches, has been strong on behalf of the community's concerns. He's worked on issues ranging from how neo-Nazi Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege obtained a provincial bailiff's license to the activities of pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel.

Scheininger, a long-time Liberal insider, tallies a lengthy list of community involvement. In addition to heading CJC nationally, he was chair of Congress's Ontario region from 1983 to 1986. He's a past president of both Associated Hebrew Schools and Jewish Family & Child Service.

Scheininger said in a statement that he wants to "give something back" to public service by making decisions and helping to shape public policy in Ontario.

The statement adds that Scheininger's candidacy has been endorsed by Joe Volpe, the Liberal member of Parliament for Eglinton-Lawrence.

Many observers agree Scheininger played a key role in helping Volpe win the Liberal nomination in the federal riding several years ago, when Volpe ousted sitting MP Roland de Corneille for the nod.

Meantime, the president of the Willowdale Provincial Liberal Association last week accused the Ontario Liberal party of "giving Willowdale up for lost and unfairly discriminating against the riding" by not calling for a nomination date.

In a statement faxed to The CJN, Mary Eapen warns the riding association "will do all that is necessary to force" leader Lyn McLeod and party president Richard Mahoney to set a nomination convention, including possible legal action and a sit-in at McLeod's office.

Similar allegations arose last week in the riding of Downsview, where two rival candidates for the Liberal nomination accused the party of "overt, biased and unfair actions," which they charge have given a third candidate an upper hand.

Israel Koschitzky remembered as businessman, philanthropist

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prominent businessman and philanthropist Israel Koschitzky died Nov. 22 in Israel at the age of 89.

Koschitzky was born in Oswiecim, Poland. He was educated at cheder and later by private tutors in Vienna.

When the Nazis invaded Poland, Koschitzky and his family fled to Russian Poland. In an irony of fate, his son Saul told The CJN, they, along with others considered untrustworthy, were shipped to Siberia — which saved their lives.

In 1948, the family came to Winnipeg before settling in Calgary, where Koschitzky founded IKO Roofing, carrying on the family business legacy from Poland.

The family, and the business, moved to Toronto in 1959.

In 1972, at the age of 67, Koschitzky made yet another move. Leaving IKO in the hands of sons Saul and Henry, he moved to Antwerp, where he built a successful asphalt shingles factory.

In the 1980s, he became a resident of Israel.

Koschitzky believed in contributing to the community. Saul remembers his father discovering there was no community mikvah. "Rabbi [Gedaliah] Felder was astonished when my father came in and offered to build one, without being asked first."

Israel Koschitzky

The Israel and Golda Koschitzky Mikvah Society for Family Sanctity opened on Sheppard Avenue near Bathurst Street in the late 1960s.

He was instrumental in purchasing and remodelling the Or Chaim yeshivah facility on Almore Drive, and more recently, in its renovation and addition.

He believed in institutions that promoted both Torah learning and secular education, and supported like-minded institutions in Israel: those that either encouraged learning and job training, or learning and army service.

Among his chief interests were Orot girls' yeshivah and hesder yeshivot Or HaTorah and Or Etzion.

He was also instrumental in building Beth Jacob Mikvah Yisroel synagogue, the only Orthodox synagogue in Calgary.

Israel Koschitzky is survived by his wife Golda, sons Saul and his wife Mira, and Henry and his wife Julie, and seven grandchildren.

Aneurysm claims oldest Mountie

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Harry Woolfe, the oldest surviving member of the Royal North-West Mounted Police (RNWMP), died Nov. 23 of an aneurysm at his Vancouver home. He was 95.

Woolfe, who was profiled in The CJN Sept. 8, would have celebrated with wife Debbie their 70th wedding anniversary in June.

Woolfe joined the RNWMP, predecessor of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, at 17. He was also a charter member of the Variety Club of British Columbia and a designated Canadian Motion Pictures Pioneer.

Debbie, hospitalized with a broken hip, attended the funeral at the Schara Tzedeck chapel in a wheelchair. Rabbi Wilfred Solomon of Beth Israel synagogue officiated.

"[Debbie and Harry] had a long, long love affair and were looking forward with great excitement to their anniversary," the rabbi said.

Born in London, England, Woolfe moved with his family to Calgary in 1910. He served in France with the Canadian calvary as part of a RNWMP contigent during World War I.

"He had a lovely personality," Rabbi Solomon said. "He was a man of distinction, and had a good life."

In addition to his wife, Woolfe is survived by a daughter, Dianne Levy, of Vancouver, three grandchildren and six great grandchildren.

TODAY'S UJA
1995 Campaign Update

This is it. No more procrastination. No matter what cliche we use - "the last lap" or "the final stretch" - it's always bottom line time during December, the Campaign's final month. This is Clean Sweep Week in which telephone volunteers have been contacting many of our 6,000 uncalled contributors. Don't wait for the phone to ring, pledge now by dialing the UJA Hotline at (416) 631-5705.

What else could you expect from the Accountants Division but canvassing efficiency? Led by Robert Furman, Joy Shuchat and George Weinberger, the divisional ledger looks like this: About three-quarters of contributors covered, with an average increase of 17% each. No wonder George has found time for some humour. "What is the difference," he asks, "Between an accountant and an actuary?" The answer: "The actuary is the guy who is good with numbers but didn't have the personality to become an accountant." Okay, so it's not Seinfeld, but it's still pretty good for an accountant.

The Physicians Division, chaired by Drs. Jack Mandel and Howard Price, is also within reach of its Campaign '95 objective. They report pledges covering 75% of their $1.6 million goal.

Here's a remarkable story of courage and compassion which tested the UJA-funded Jewish Agency's ingenuity. Just before Rosh Hashana, six orphans from one Indian family landed at Ben Gurion airport. Ever since their parents died within two months of each other four years ago, the Malyanker children have been taking care of themselves. Moses, 19, Yael, 17, Yakobeth, 16, Danny, 14 and 12 year old Rebecca lived in the village of Pali, a five hour drive from Bombay. When the Malyankers decided to make aliyah, the Jewish Agency, assisted by the Joint Distribution Committee, worked out a way for the kids to continue living together in Ashkelon without an older adult. The city assigned the family outside help, including a daily care provider. Even more fortunate is the presence in Ashkelon of their Indian social worker who communicates with the Malyankers in Marathi, their mother tongue.

Happy 80th birthday to the Chenstochover Aid Society. Founded in 1914, the Society's mission was supporting and comforting refugees to Canada from the Polish city of Chenstochov. The first wave of newcomers coincided with World War I. The second significant immigrant entry followed the Holocaust. These were survivors, who had lost everything but their lives. The Society not only offered them a large helping hand but has always displayed generosity to others through UJA. The Chenstochover Aid Society, led by its president Philip Skovronek, is one of many demonstrating enormous loyalty to United Jewish Appeal.

Now to end with this inspiration tale of beginner's luck. Early September, the Young Construction Network's Howard Kumer made his very first canvassing call. The result? A $3,000 gift from someone who had never contributed before. Who needs Las Vegas?

Mazon responds to proposed cuts

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada is asking its supporters to help alleviate the possible effects of the federal government's proposed social program cuts by contributing to its hunger relief efforts.

With Finance Minister Paul Martin set to wage a "holy war against the deficit," the result will be "much suffering from those least able to defend themselves," says a front page article in Mazonews, the organization's newsletter.

"Helping organizations and institutions, Mazon included, will be faced with greater demands under more difficult circumstances. I also fear that today's budget cuts will be tomorrow's social costs because of the loss of key early-intervention and prevention programs which 'pay for themselves' by preventing or minimizing social dependence," states the article, written by Mazon board member Roger Hyman.

"The lights we kindle at Chanukah have always represented an affirmation of hope and faith against darkness. This year, many people who depend on us may be approaching a dark time — literally and figuratively. They may well be looking through the gloom to see just how brightly our candles burn," the article states.

Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, executive director of Mazon, said the organization is not staking out a political position. It is merely suggesting to its contributors that, regardless of the state of the economy, hunger in Canada continues to be a problem.

Mazon has been told by a number of food banks that they predict increased demand for their services, she added.

Mazon bills itself as "a Jewish response to hunger." The seven-year-old organization collects contributions through a variety of fundraising means and allocates them twice yearly to frontline organizations like food banks, which tackle the problem of hunger.

It has grown from a Toronto-based group which allocated $25,000 in its first year, to a country-wide organization which allocated $143,750 in 1994. Since its inception, Mazon has distributed $617,400 in all.

In recent years, 67 synagogues from across Canada have supported Mazon by making pledge cards available to members. Thirty thousands of the cards were distributed during the High Holidays.

Mazon also raises funds through the sale of personalized place cards for simchahs, by offering certificates in the name of departed loved ones or in honor of bar/bat mitzvahs and through the solicitation of donations from restaurants and individuals.

The recipients of Mazon allocations included Jewish and non-Jewish organizations, from Truro, N.S., to Victoria, B.C.

For more information or to get a copy of the newsletter, contact Mazon at 788 Marlee Avenue, Suite 206, Toronto, Ont., M6B 3K1, telephone: (416) 783-7554. Mazon's Montreal address is 2255 Lambert Closse, Suite A, Montreal, Que., H3H 1Z9, telephone: (514) 931-5212.

Granddad graduates from York University

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Henry Wexler, 79, is the third generation of his family to study at York University.

Earlier this month, the visually impaired grandfather graduated from the university with a BA in history. He told The CJN he was helped by his professors and study aids like talking books.

Wexler fulfilled his dream of attending university after retiring 14 years ago.

His Romanian parents operated a dry goods business in Welland, Ont., where he lived until his mother died when he was 7 and he and his two brothers went to live with their maternal grandparents, Joseph and Rae Moscovitz, in Hamilton, Ont. Ten years later, he and his brothers moved to New York where their father had remarried and settled.

"Since this was during the Great Depression, it was necessary for me to go to work and school was out of the question," Wexler said.

After serving in the U.S. army, he worked in men's wear and the automotive parts business, marrying Rose Persofsky of Toronto in 1949.

The Wexlers have two children, Alan and Marlene, and five grandchildren. Alan graduated from York before studying law, and grandson Jason Flicht "will receive an honors degree there this spring," Wexler said. Daughter-in-law Nita also attended York.

Henry Wexler

Wexler retired in 1980 and took courses at various institutions before settling in at York in 1984. He said his is now thinking of going back next year. "I would like to get an honors degree in history and political science.

"I finally reached my goal. My graduation was beautiful and it was one of the highlights of my life — and to be surrounded by my family, it was great."

Kaplan feted in evening of unabashed sentimentality

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some politicians are popular in office and fade away once they retire. Others win sudden popularity only after they quit politics. Then, there's Bob Kaplan.

He served as a Liberal MP for 25 years. And judging by last week's gathering at the Montecassino Hotel, the now-retired Kaplan can still pack a room.

Some 600 Liberals, community and religious figures, current and former politicians, friends and family paid tribute to Kaplan in an evening that flowed with unabashed sentimentality.

Prime Minister Jean Chretien, in a video tribute, lauded Kaplan as a great Canadian. Chretien reminisced about the days when the two were cabinet ministers in Pierre Trudeau's government.

Hindus, Sikhs, Muslims and Jews sat side by side to hear Solicitor-General Herb Gray and Treasury Board president Art Eggleton praise Kaplan, one of the few Jews to have served in the federal cabinet.

Joining them were Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi, former Tory cabinet minister Gerry Weiner, Sen. Jack Austin, Federal Court judge Bud Cullen, Liberal MPPs Greg Sorbara and Elinor Caplan, and several municipal figures.

Kaplan sat with his wife Estherelke, mother Pearl, three children and four grandchildren.

Rabbi Irwin Witty and Monsignor Joseph Sbrocchi recited Grace and blessings.

Kaplan, who retired from politics last year, has been appointed the honorary consul general in Canada of Khazakstan, the former Soviet republic, Gray announced.

Kaplan was first elected to Parliament in 1968, with a stunning victory in the Toronto riding of Don Valley over Tory stalwart Dalton Camp.

He won re-election in York Centre in the next five federal votes and announced in 1991 that he would not run in the next election.

As solicitor-general under Trudeau, Kaplan earned both the praise and ire of Canada's Jewish community for his pursuit of alleged Nazi war criminals living in this country.

His efforts resulted in one conviction — the deportation of Helmut Rauca from Toronto to what was then West Germany, where he was wanted for the murder of over 15,000 Jewish civilians. Rauca died in his German jail cell awaiting trial.

Many in the Jewish community slammed Kaplan for doing what they said was too little on the war criminal file.

It was also Kaplan's watch that led to the Young Offenders Act and legislation that set up Canada's domestic spy service, CSIS.

In his remarks, the honoree confessed to having mixed feelings about leaving politics. He mentioned former Tory cabinet minister Erik Nielsen and former Liberal cabinet minister Mark MacGuigan as friends and mentors.

Proceeds from the $75 per plate dinner will go towards establishing the Robert P. Kaplan Scholarship Fund, to be awarded annually to graduating high school students in York Centre who show strong academic skills in history or political science, leadership abilities, a sense of community and financial need.

DINING AROUND TOWN
By: Steven Basil

There's a great new place in Hazelton Lanes that is a "must-see" when you're downtown. Carlos & Pepe's is located at 87A Avenue Road, 2 blocks north of Bloor, and is easily one of Toronto's most unique dining experiences. From its traditional adobe walls with hanging carved masks to the natural woods in the tables and chairs, Carlos & Pepe's takes you on a visual voyage back to the land of the Aztecs. The margaritas are served in fabulously large, hand-made Mexican goblets, which really show a commitment to detail in this restaurant's overall design. Every client at Carlos & Pepe's gets a warm welcome and a complimentary basket of crisp homemade tortilla chips, salsa comes in two bowls – hot and mild. The plates are over-sized with bright colourful designs and piled high with food. And I mean HIGH! Carlos & Pepe's offers all types of Cal/Mex culinary artistry from the "Favoritas De La Casa to the A la California Chicken Mango" and don't forget the all time favorites chicken or beef fajitas.

Live Mariachis will serenade you Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings.

In these times, when most folks are trying to stretch their dining dollar, Carlos & Pepe's really comes through for its customers. Exciting decor, swift and friendly service matched with great food at great prices make Carlos & Pepe's the place to visit. Oh, don't forget the Mexican-style ice cream covered with whipped cream and honey, the best way to cap a great evening at Carlos & Pepe's.

Danforth Shul grows in Greek community

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The souvlaki restaurants and sidewalk cafes of Greektown, the trendy strip of the Danforth east of the Don Valley Parkway, seem unlikely neighbors for an Orthodox congregation, but the Danforth Shul is taking root in this east end community.

The shul, founded seven months ago, made headlines when it held High Holiday services in the Athenian Gardens, a local Greek restaurant.

Documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, a founder of the Danforth Shul, told The CJN that when he married three years ago he and his wife, both observant, were torn between moving out of Riverdale to live close to a shul, and staying in the area and starting one.

"I consulted with a rabbi and he told me you're supposed to 'light a match where there is darkness.' He said, 'Stay where you are and start a shul,' " Jacobovici said.

He said he doesn't know how many Jews live in the Riverdale area but thinks there are a lot; he and his wife counted 18 houses with mezuzot on his street alone. Records from the Hebrew heritage program held in a local public school show that more than 60 families have used the program in the last four years.

Jacobovici said many of his friends tried to discourage him from starting the shul because they didn't think Jews in Riverdale — many are intermarried and very assimilated — would affiliate with a synagogue.

Between 150 and 200 people showed up at the Athenian Gardens for the holiday services and close to 90 came to Jacobovici's house on Sukkot.

Despite the strong turnout, the Jews in the community have not given the Danforth shul their full blessings. Some commented privately that they would prefer an egalitarian shul.

But many non-Jewish members of the Riverdale community, and Jewish institutions, are very supportive. Toronto city councillor Peter Tabuns helped secure a public office at 235 Danforth Ave. for Shabbat services. It is a temporary location.

"I see them as a legitimate part of the community, like any other community group," he told The CJN. "They asked for assistance and I was able to give them the assistance. I'm glad I could."

Richard Chartash, another shul co-founder, said Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers for Gentlemen on the Danforth has hooked the congregation up with Greek business leaders.

They see the synagogue as a valuable addition to the neighborhood, and they're trying to help the congregation find an affordable and suitable permanent space, Chartash said.

Jacobovici said he tried four years ago to start a minyan, but received only two responses — one from Chartash and the other from Korman. "Saul (Korman) told me, 'If you ever get your shul going contact me and I'll help you,' " Jacobovici said.

Chartash and Jacobovici then started communal services on Shabbat, Chartash told The CJN. "We decided that if we pray they'll come." By mid July there was a core group of six men and six women, and in August they had their first minyan. Today 15 to 20 adults attend the weekly services.

Jacobovici's wife Nicole took Korman up on his offer to help the fledging shul when it came to planning High Holiday services. "I went in there a little nervous about approaching someone who my husband spoke to two years earlier," she told The CJN. "He said, 'Let's do it,' and within a half an hour I was standing in the Athenian Gardens."

Yossi Sapirman, an Orthodox bicycle repairman, is the shul's spiritual leader. He led High Holiday services and told The CJN he was drawn to the congregation because they're "building a community not just a shul.

"I love coming down here. It's fresh," he said. "Some of the people are seeing Torah Judaism for the first time in their lives and some of them like me are seeing it again and appreciating it for the first time."

Minhagim defy universal definition, expert says

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sometimes it's the simplest question that's the hardest to answer.

Rabbi Daniel Sperber, Talmud scholar, Bar-Ilan University professor, recipient of the prestigious Israel Prize, author of 15 books, and expert on minhagim (customs), hesitates when asked to define this field of expertise.

"You can't define a minhag," he says. "All the simple definitions don't really answer the basic questions. Some would say that a minhag is very localized, but there are many minhagim which are universal."

During medieval times, Jews fasted from morning to night and refrained from conducting business during the three weeks preceding Tisha B'Av — minhagim which have been "totally forgotten," Rabbi Sperber said during a recent interview at the Toronto office of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University.

Rabbi Daniel Sperber

The Welsh-born rabbi, 54, who was educated in England and Israel, is also an expert on art history and a broad spectrum of Jewish history. He was in town to help raise funds for the university's institute of advanced Torah studies and midrasha for women.

"I don't think there's a conscious effort to cancel [minhagim], but they do cease to become operative," Rabbi Sperber said.

Minhagim with rabbinic recognition are difficult to do away with, he said. One exception is that when Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews marry, the wife adopts the husband's traditions.

"Ashkenazi women [who marry Sephardi men] have a unique opportunity," said the rabbi with a twinkle in his eye, referring to the Ashkenazi prohibition against eating legumes during Passover.

In Rabbi Sperber's own family, a new cultural element was added when he and his wife adopted an Ethiopian orphan, the youngest of their 10 children.

Ethiopian Jewish traditions predate Halachah, which means certain customs contravene Halachic law and cannot be adopted in his household, Rabbi Sperber explained. The multilingual rabbi, who speaks more than 12 languages, considers himself limited because he cannot read Amharic texts on Jewish customs.

Not all Jewish minhagim have Jewish roots. Rabbi Sperber recalls his Eastern European grandmother dropping rinds of bread into a glass of water and saying "Pui, pui" to ward off the evil eye, a custom which he said can be traced to non-Jewish cultures.

Rabbi Sperber's interest and expertise in minhagim (the subject of three of his books) is connected to his position as rabbi of Yad Tamar, an independent community he founded in Rehavia, Jerusalem, in 1970. For several years he gave 10-minute Friday night talks on different minhagim, which he researched extensively.

For almost two years he had a weekly radio spot, Minhag VaDin, on Kol Yisrael.

"I always saw the Halachah as being like the outlines on a painting. The shading is minhag."

Survivors' families meet

WINNIPEG — On Nov. 24, the newly reformed Second Generation group for children and grandchildren of Holocaust survivors held its first public program.

Thirty-two people watched the film Dark Lullabies.

"It was a good opportunity for second and third generation people to get together and discuss what direction our group should go," said co-chair Sharon Goszner Tritt.

Winnipeg's original Second Generation Group was formed several years ago to compile audio interviews with survivors. It then faded away. Morris Henoch, one of the organizers of the first group, is working with the new group as a mentor.

The group's resurgence was sparked by an April presentation by Dr. Robert Krell, a Vancouver psychiatrist who works with Holocaust survivors.

The new organization is open to the community as a whole but, Tritt said the group hopes to attract the children and grandchildren of survivors. — M.L.

Survivors' traumas overlooked in past

By ROSE TOGMAN HEILBRONN
Special to The CJN

Dr. Eva Fogelman

TORONTO — When Holocaust survivors most needed a kind word, mental health professionals, like the rest of society, denied their persecutions and their traumas.

And in the late 1950s, when clinicians began treating the few Holocaust survivors who sought help for severe psychiatric symptoms, therapists generalized the problems of their patients and branded all survivors sick, thus establishing damaging stereotypes, according to Dr. Eva Fogelman.

Social psychologist, psychotherapist, film-maker and author, Fogelman is a pioneer in group work with children of survivors in the United States and Israel. She recently addressed the third annual conference for health practitioners working with Holocaust survivors and their children, co-sponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Jewish Family and Child Service.

Fogelman stressed that only a small percentage of survivors have sought professional help.

To understand survivors, she said, it is important to consider not only their experiences before and during the Holocaust, but how they were treated after the war.

Jewish communities in North America shunned them, she said. Immigrant hardships were compounded because of survivors' loneliness and isolation.

"American Jews felt they would be tainted by the stench of Auschwitz," Fogelman said.

She credited Toronto's Dr. Vivian Rakoff with being among the first professionals to confront the denial about the Holocaust that persisted after the war.

In the mid-1960s, at Montreal's Jewish General Hospital, Rakoff and his colleagues pioneered therapy with survivor families.

"Their sensitivity was tremendously healing for these families, because it helped them understand their current situation in a way they couldn't understand it before," she said.

Therapists, she said, must recognize survivors' strengths and resiliency. With no extended families, they still built new lives. In the wake of "layers of losses," after liberation they created new families, reclaimed their Jewish identity and helped build the State of Israel.

In the United States, the Jewish day school movement was initiated by survivors, she claimed.

By creating their own social groups like landsmannshaft organizations, synagogues and community centres, survivors helped each other and became extended families. They learned to heal themselves, Fogelman said.

Today, survivors are using their experiences in constructive ways to deal with their own aging, she said. Many write memoirs, give oral testimony or become Holocaust educators.

Understanding survivors, she said, is important for other traumatized groups, such as rape victims.

Winnipeg trust fund promotes Yiddishkeit

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The newly created I.L. Peretz Folk School Endowment Trust is now accepting funding requests from organizations or individuals which promote Yiddish language, education and culture.

School board chair Joe Elfenbaum said the invitation extends to scholarships, Yiddish lectures and concert programs. "In October, we sent two cheques to Israel to support Yiddish programs," he said.

Funding will come from the interest earned on a $363,000 permanent trust fund the board has established with the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to perpetuate the Yiddish-language I.L. Peretz Folk School, which after 69 years was amalgamated with the Hebrew-language Talmud Torah in 1983.

The Peretz School building was sold in June 1991 to a Christian private school for $363,000.

"Our goal was that the Peretz School should not die," said Elfenbaum, one of the 12 living school presidents that make up the board of governors. "Our decision has paid off."

The Peretz board of governors has the final say as to how the interest is to be distributed. However, $100,000 has been set aside to support the Jewish Community Campus, the kindergarten to Grade 12 school and community centre scheduled to open in 1997. Interest will pay for a Peretz School corner in the Jewish museum which is to be part of the complex.

"Forty or a hundred years from now, we want people to see that there once was a Peretz School," Elfenbaum said.

Some funding has also been directed to Winnipeg's Yiddish choir, the Jewish library and the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre.

Plaque dedicated in memory of Rabbi Steinberg

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, a plaque in the lobby of the Lipa Green building has been dedicated to the memory of a communal employee.

Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg was community chaplain from 1973 until his untimely death in 1993.

Nearly 100 colleagues, friends and relatives of Rabbi Steinberg, including his widow, Shirley Steinberg Zimberg and daughter Chana, gathered for the dedication.

Master of ceremonies Stephen Speisman, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and a close friend of the rabbi, said that "the mere mention of his name calls up stories of how he influenced people's lives, of how much we depended upon him."

Rabbi Steinberg, he said, put into practice the ideal of the love one Jew should have for another. "He raised the level of holiness of the building."

The principal speaker, Rabbi Irwin Witty, director of the Board of Jewish Education and also a close friend, said that Rabbi Steinberg "had a dream that all human beings could be brothers."

The plaque, he said, is an important and ongoing reminder of the rabbi. "It is a symbol — those who didn't know him will pass by and wonder what kind of man could it be to have such a plaque dedicated to him."

'He made a difference'

He eased the pain of those who were sorely tried, Rabbi Witty said; the sick, the bereaved and those incarcerated, without regard to blame.

"They had their lot made better because another human being cared.

"This was a man of whom it can truly be said 'Yes, he made a difference.' "

An emotional Shirley Steinberg Zimberg praised her late husband as a person who "believed life was a gift. He served G-d with joy."

The plaque was placed in position by Avrum Rosensweig, a campaign associate of UJA/Federation, and a member of the special dates committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, composed of Federation staff, which organized the event.

Beginning with a verse from Psalm 15, "L-rd, who shall abide in thy tent? He that walks uprightly, and acts justly and speaks the truth in his heart," the plaque refers to Rabbi Steinberg as a "colleague, mentor, and friend," who is "fondly remembered by a grateful community."

WORKS OF ART

Mark Hart

Toronto teen battles leukemia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — All just-turned-17 Mark Hart wants is to be a normal teenager. He wants to hang around with his friends. He is passionate about basketball. He even looks forward to attending classes at Sir Sandford Fleming Secondary School.

These do not seem like terribly ambitious goals — until you realize that Mark has fought a three-and-a-half-year battle against acute lymphocytic leukemia.

Increasing chemotherapy seemed to be working for him, until a routine doctor's appointment disclosed that his condition was rapidly deteriorating.

His only chance is a bone marrow transplant.

Now Mark's family is following in the footsteps of New Jersey man Jay Feinberg and Toronto six-year-old Elizabeth Lue in a desperate search for a compatible donor.

Mark's ethnic origin is Jewish, Eastern and Western European, and native Canadian.

Doctors have indicated that it is even more difficult to find a donor for those of mixed ethnic descent.

Nobody in his family is a match, and his father and stepmother, Russell and Audrey Hart, and his mother Carol, are appealing to the Jewish community.

A mass blood screening will be held on Wednesday, Dec. 14, at Holy Blossom Temple, Philip Smith Hall, from 5 to 9 p.m.

Stepmother Audrey Pollock-Hart said, "By all working together, we can benefit Mark and Jay [Feinberg] and 9,000 others looking for bone marrow transplants."

The cost for each test is $60, and the Harts are also trying to raise necessary funds. Tax-deductible donations can be made to the Elizabeth Lue Memorial Fund (Mark Hart), 700 Briar Hill Ave., Toronto, M6B 1L3, or through the Bank of Montreal.

For more information, telephone 785-MARK.

The Toronto Jewish community is noted for its generous support of those needing transplants. Others have been helped through earlier drives — it is not too late to come through for Mark Hart.

Canadians help Israel's ambulance service

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — This year Tsippi Shainhouse, 18, was a Magen David Adom ambulance volunteer stationed in Jerusalem.

It was the first time the former lifeguard ever used her first aid training.

She bandaged wounds, took blood pressure, laid accident victims on spinal boards and applied neck braces from mid-May to the end of July.

Shainhouse recalled that on one of her calls the distraught wife of a stroke victim was speaking French to ambulance attendants who could not understand her.

"No one knew how to deal with it, and I turned around and I started speaking to her. My French isn't so amazing in Toronto — I dropped it in Grade 10 — but I was able to calm her down."

A biology major in her second year at York University, she hopes to study medicine.

Jeffrey Spodek, 22, a first year medical student at the University of Western Ontario, learned about the emotional aspects of illness while he was a volunteer in Jerusalem. Through interviewing the patients in the ambulance, he said he gained "an understanding of what the patient feels and what the family goes through in terms of the crisis."

Shainhouse and Spodek are two of 10 Magen David Adom (MDA) ambulance volunteers — nine from Toronto and one from Winnipeg — who were recently honored at Toronto's Israel Aliyah Center (IAC).

They received plaques, $400 MDA scholarships and letters of appreciation. Trees have been planted in Israel in their names by the Aliyah Department of the World Zionist Organization.

According to program director Ron Wald, a 1991 and 1992 ambulance volunteer, participants experience Israel from "front row centre." When you work on an ambulance, he said "you go into the lives of people who are unfortunately experiencing very difficult situations, and that is the true way to see Israeli society, from the inside to its rawest extent."

MDA provides emergency services throughout Israel and relies heavily on volunteers to provide first aid.

The IAC in Montreal began sending ambulance volunteers to Jerusalem five years ago, and this year, for the first time, five of the fifteen volunteers from Toronto, Winnipeg and Montreal, were sent to Tel Aviv. Participants are expected to pay most of their own expenses, including training, air fare and living expenses.

Itzhak Dahan, executive director of IAC Montreal, said the program, which currently operates out of IAC offices in Toronto and Montreal, will soon go national and be expected to accommodate 25 volunteers. The IAC, he added, is confident that the young volunteers will eventually make aliyah.

Kurt Rothchild, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, praised the volunteers for their humanitarian efforts and for setting an example to other young Jews, many of whom are drifting away from Judaism.

"Judaism and Israel doesn't mean enough to them. You who have gone to Israel and have volunteered are showing a wonderful example of both the humanitarian, compassionate aspect of what Jews are all about, what Judaism is all about, and the tie to Israel."

MDA representative Judge Alfred Segall and Ehud Savion, regional director of Toronto's IAC, attended.

For information about the ambulance volunteer program, call (514) 486-9526.

Proposals filed for JCC creditors

concerns about replenishing the fund (the theatre is named after his mother). Ontario Court Justice John Farley ordered Posluns and the Federation to participate in an Alternative Dispute Resolution, after which the Federation agreed to replenish the JCC's endowments.

However, control of the theatre will vest in the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), which will operate the facilities owned by 4588 Bathurst Centre.

A spokesman for the BJC was upbeat about the latest developments while Federation President Bernie Ghert was much more reserved.

"We're very enthusiastic about this proposal," said BJC spokesman Howard English. "It's the best solution to ensure the long-term financial viability of the BJC."

Asked to comment on the progress made in negotiations, Ghert said, "Whether it's progress or not, I have no idea."

Ghert, who during the summer said the Federation did not have the money to pay all the JCC's debts in full, said "the Federation will have to raise the money [through] . . . an overall community capital campaign . . . It's additional money that will come out of the community in the future."

He added, "I'm concerned there will be a lot of criticism in the community about this."

Ghert said a possible negative reaction might come from those "who have other priorities as to how community money ought to be spent. They ask, why not spend it on education,. . . to endow senior care, for supplemental assistance [a Jewish Family & Child Service program]?"

Ghert said he had heard such comments in private, "but it's not good enough to say it in private.

"I'm visualizing a very, very large campaign," he continued.

Campaign requirements

He said the Federation's finance resource development committee will examine the campaign requirements and make their recommendations to the Federation's officers.

Ghert said "the Federation's policy is to give the community what it wants. It might not get what is provident [prudent]."

Referring to the long-term lessons of the JCC saga, Ghert said, "We shouldn't permit communal agencies to be governed in such a way, with such a lack of care and attention, that the directors of the agencies are permitted to put [the agencies] in such difficult financial situations."

Alumni recall Habonim as central to their lives

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Helen Klingman calls her involvement with Habonim "a life-moulding experience.

"You can't begin to imagine the closeness of the group," she said at the recent Habonim Dror reunion held at the Borochov Centre.

Recalling her days with Habonim in the 1940s, Klingman said "we were at [the Farband Shule] cheder together all week, spent weekends at Habonim [activities] at 24 Cecil Street and summers together at Kvutza (camp). You were more like a family than just friends. It really was the centre of our being."

The Habonim and Dror Zionist youth movements merged in the early 1980s.

Habonim was the source of Naamat president Etty Danzig's ideological grounding, she said. "It's the basis for everything I've done ever since."

In the late 1950s and early '60s, Habonim was "a very big part of the vibrant Jewish life in Toronto," said Faigie Wise, who recalls the weekly Onegei Shabbat held at the Borochov Centre on Lippincott Street.

Julie Sokoloff, 74, national president of the Labour Zionist Movement (of which Habonim Dror is the youth movement), remembers when Habonim was known as Young Poale Zion, just prior to his joining the movement in the mid-1930s.

Idealism of state

"The idea was to educate [youngsters] zionistically and give them the concept of a Jewish state with a Jewish majority. The idealism of the state was a big part of what we talked about," he recalled.

Following high school, Habonim members could train at Hachshara, a working farm in Smithville, Ont., designed to prepare chalutzim (pioneers) to settle in what was then Palestine.

Before Smithville, the training farm was located in Cambridge, Ont., said Sokoloff, who was scheduled to begin his own training when World War II broke out.

Charlotte Cheifetz met her husband Cocoa in Smithville in 1949. They married shortly before making aliyah in 1950. Cheifetz, now back in Canada, lived for six years on Kibbutz Urim in the Negev.

These days, Habonim Dror's focus is on the summer camping season, said the organization's Toronto shlichah, Orit Praag.

Camp Gesher, located on Pringle Lake, is its only camp in eastern Ontario, and draws children from Hamilton, Kitchener, Toronto, Kingston and Ottawa. This past summer, there were 260 campers, Praag said.

Gesher is one of two Habonim Dror camps in Canada, the other being Camp Miriam in British Columbia.

During the year, local kenim (chapters) have educational and social activities in Vancouver, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Kingston and Montreal. A new chapter in Kitchener is in the works, said Praag. The Kingston chapter was started last year by Meir Moran, Ottawa's Habonim Dror shaliach.

A brief program at the reunion included music by singer Ilana Milman, accompanied by Doron Ophir, and a poem read by Gesher counsellors Jannice Friedman of Toronto and Yona Randor of Hamilton. Gerry Anklewicz was emcee

BOWLING HALL OF FAME

The late Joseph "Rusty" Starr was one of 7 people recently inducted into the Five Pin Bowling Hall of Fame by the Ontario Five Pin Bowlers' Association.

Starr, whose career spanned nearly 30 years, until his death in 1974, earned his bowling skills while working as a pinboy and honed them at Spadina Bowl, a centre where bowling for money was a frequent weekend activity. Throughout his career he played for the City Major League and qualified for the first Ontario Championship conducted by the Ontario Bowler's Congress.

Starr's brother David received the honor on behalf of his brother at a dinner sponsored by the Bowling Proprietors' Association and the Ontario Bowlers' Congress. The purpose of the dinner is to honor individuals who have contributed to the growth of the bowling industry over a period of time.

Arts, cultural programs expand at Bloor JCC

TORONTO — Signalling yet another break from the old Jewish Community Centre, the new Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) has expanded its arts and culture programming.

Theatre, book readings, films and art exhibits are now as much a part of Bloor as aerobics and the shvitz.

Dec. 12 is opening night for the Medina Theatre Ensemble's production of Cheaters, a comedy in two acts by Michael Jacobs. Directed by Sean Mulcahy, the production will run from Dec. 12-18 at 8 p.m. with a Dec. 18 matinee at 2 p.m.

The Medina Theatre Ensemble, which is comprised of professional and amateur actors, will offer workshops in directing, improvisation and other phases of acting. They also welcome new members interested in other aspects of the theatre, such as administration, set design, lighting, costumes, publicity and programming. Membership is $25 per year.

The Jewish Theatre Committee (JTC) of Toronto, an organization which uses theatre to promote Jewish continuity, held its first program recently with a rehearsed staged reading of the Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest's 1994 winner, This Night the Kapo.

The JTC has inaugurated a new project called First Words, to give playwrights a chance to have their works read professionally in public with the audience providing feedback. The first program was held Dec. 6 with an interactive drama on a Holocaust theme. The next program is scheduled for March.

On Dec. 11, Howard Engel, author of the popular Benny Cooperman mysteries, will read from his works as part of the Sunday Books & Bagels reading series.

The next program is scheduled for Jan. 29, when Libby Scheier, author of the recently published collection Saints and Runners, will read.

The BJCC has established a new association with the Koffler Gallery to stage a series of exhibitions in the Centre's Wallin Lounge. The program will include a variety of exhibitions of painting, sculpture, photography and the decorative arts.

In January, North York artist Sandra Silverzweig will hold her first-ever exhibition of paintings and works on paper.

The Toronto Jewish Film Society will offer screenings throughout the year at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

For more information, contact the Bloor JCC at 924-6211.

JNF honors survivors' families

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For its 43rd annual Negev Dinner, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) for Manitoba and Saskatchewan has chosen to honor the 200 or so local families of Holocaust survivors.

"We have spoken to some of them and they are very enthusiastic," said Zeev Kedem, the JNF shaliach in Winnipeg.

"We felt with 1995 marking the 50th anniversary of the war's end that it was an appropriate time to give tribute to survivors and their families. They symbolize the victory of the Jewish People over the evil that was Nazism."

Winnipeg's JNF Negev Dinner is the largest fundraising event of its kind in North America. It normally draws up to 1,500 people. The 1995 dinner, slated for June 20, is expected to attract over 1,800, including children and grandchildren of the honorees and members of the general community. There will also be a special commemorative book distributed at the dinner.

"In the past, we have generally honored individuals (with the exception of the Simkin Family in 1992)," Kedem said. "This is a unique event. We wanted to honor the survivors before it was too late. We are hoping this will be an opportunity for the families to come out and celebrate."

It's hard to keep Shabbat in remote Canadian Shield

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's hard to say who gets around more, South Africans living in Canada or Manischewitz's sticky-sweet wines.

In a small town in northwestern Ontario, is just about the last place on earth you'd expect, the two exotic commodities to coincide on a weekly basis come erev Shabbat.

It's tough trying to maintain a home with a Yiddishe atmosphere in the remote mining town of Manitouwadge, said Alison Thompson, a native of Durban, South Africa.

But as Shabbat approaches, she bakes a challah and heads down to the local liquor store where the racks of reds hold Manischewitz's prized sacramental wine.

Who in Manitouwadge besides the Thompsons would be interested in Manichewitz, Alison doesn't know. Nevertheless, it's become a key ingredient in preparing for Shabbat for herself, husband Ivan and children Rachel, 5, and Danielle, 1.

As the only Jewish couple in Manitouwadge, located north of Lake Superior midway between Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay, the Thompsons miss the traditional Shabbat atmosphere of Durban. But thanks to links forged at a get-together in Sudbury sponsored two years ago by Canadian Jewish Congress, they were able to celebrate a Shabbaton recently in the company of other Jewish couples.

Alison said she invited Fred and Judy Ball of Thunder Bay and Gill and Ginny Cymbalist of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. (just across a river from its Ontario counterpart) to visit Manitouwadge.

"We got together and shared kiddush," Alison said. "Having Jewish families together [created] a little Yiddishkeit. We miss going to shul and having family together for Shabbat. That's what we're used to."

Susan Jackson, director of community services and youth activities for Congress' Ontario region, lauded the Thompsons' efforts to create a Jewish environment in such a remote location. She said the family is plugged into Congress' Family Project, designed to enhance the Shabbat experience for those living in smaller centres.

They receive a weekly storybook version of the Torah parshah with arts and crafts for the children.

The materials are distributed to Jewish families in North Bay, Thunder Bay, Niagara Falls, Sarnia, Peterborough and even in two Michigan locales, Sault Ste. Marie and Pickford.

Jackson said Jewish families populate the unlikliest places. There another South African family in the small town of Nakina, northeast of Thunder Bay.

"South Africans tend to be all over the show," Alison said.

But it's Sault Ste. Marie, Ont. that is the hub of Jewish life in that part of the province, she said. The community there boasts an expanding synagogue and a slate of community activities. The Thompsons try to make it there for holidays like Rosh Hashanah and Chanukah, weather permitting.

Moving to northern Canada from South Africa "took a lot of adjusting to the cold," Alison said. "I imagined people stayed indoors, but they're out skiing, hiking and skating." Ivan has taken up downhill skiing and Rachel has made her first lap on an indoor skating rink, practically qualifying them for Canadian citizenship. They hold landed immigrant status.

Alison said the family enjoys the community they've chosen. "We're right in the middle of the bush, in hilly terrain. When it snows, it's a Chanukah wonderland," she said.

Grocers greet immigrants with consumer pack

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Thousands of new immigrants have been introduced to Canadian manufacturers and products in the last five years, thanks to the innovative Canada Welcome Pack.

Any newcomers who have been in Canada for less than two years and are Ontario residents may register with Canada Welcome Pack. They will receive a certificate in the mail, which they can take to the Oshawa Foods Food City, Price Chopper or selected IGA stores near them. After showing their passport, immigration papers or work permit, they exchange the certificate for the package, worth about $35.

There is no obligation or charge, and all costs are borne by the manufacturers.

This is not a charity, and there are no government connections, organizer and creator Kurt Brundtland told The CJN.

Everyone benefits, he said. The new immigrants learn about Canadian household products, and the manufacturers get to have their products tried by potential consumers.

As well, Oshawa Foods grocery stores, which distribute the packs, get the opportunity to meet new customers.

Excellent response

Brands include Kellogg, Cloverleaf, Red Rose, Halls, Ivory, Vim and Sunlight, and products range from food and cough drops to soap, mouthwash and household cleaning supplies.

Most of the products are kosher, although, Brundtland admits, that is "just good luck."

Response has been excellent, he said. Research conducted in participants' homes show that the average repurchase rate for the products in the pack is 72 per cent, much higher than the usual repurchase rate of 20 to 25 per cent.

Newcomers to Canada from England, Hong Kong, Peru, Russia and Vietnam, along with the program's founder, Knut Brundtland, help launch this year's Canada Welcome Pack.

(Interestingly, Heinz ketchup has the highest score at 90 per cent.)

Brundtland, who came to Canada from Norway in 1969, compares it to his own experience as an immigrant. "You really don't know what's up [about shopping]."

With the Canada Welcome Pack, you get to try different common products without any obligation. Also, when the new consumer sees the package again, he or she recognizes it and will be more likely to buy it again.

Finally, Brundtland said, there is goodwill built up by the whole project, "and you can never measure goodwill!"

To make the packs more effective, product education and information is in English, Russian, Spanish, Farsi, Chinese, Vietnamese and Polish.

Applications are available at many ethnocultural centres and immigrant societies in southern Ontario, or by writing Canada Welcome Pack, 4981 Highway 7 East, Unit 12A, Suite 241, Markham, Ont. L3R 1N1. The pack is offered in the greater Toronto and Montreal areas and in the lower mainland Vancouver area.

Israeli-Arab firm may hold key to Mideast markets

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

ISRAEL — Jaffa Communications, an Israeli-Arab owned ad agency is set to inaugurate its Middle East division and new Jaffa offices.

Only three of the many advertising agencies here cater to the Arab sector, and Jaffa Communications is the only one which operates independently, says director Makram Khoury Machool.

As Israeli companies begin assessing regional markets, Khoury Machool says, Jaffa Communications is in a unique position to market Israel to the untapped potential in the Arab world.

This is due largely, he says, to lack of awareness of market size by advertisers and poor judgment on the part of ad agencies, who do not target campaigns correctly.

He points to a campaign he created for Kupat Holim Clalit, who wanted a campaign geared specifically to the young.

"We found that most of the Arab population in Israel is young [between 18 and 25]," he says.

Jaffa Communications estimated the potential clientele for Kupat Holim Clalit at 60,000.

"We were conservative," says Khoury Machool. Their comprehensive campaign, which included TV, radio, wall posters and print media, brought 90,000 new members from the Arab sector into Kupat Holim Clalit.

"That's what a tailor-made campaign can do."

Khoury Machool, 31, has spent the last 12 years of his life in communications. After graduating from Tel Aviv University's school of communications, he worked as a radio reporter in Arabic, served as consultant and researcher for Educational Television, and wrote for the Tel Aviv weekly Ha'ir.

Khoury Machool then opened the Tel Aviv bureau of the Haifa-based daily paper, Al Ittihad, running its editorial and advertising departments and winning a Reuters award for journalism. He went to Oxford in 1990 as a Post-Master Research Fellow in Communications and Middle East studies.

The Gulf War convinced him that a Middle East peace was "only a matter of time, and what would move it was economics and communications."

The contacts Khoury Machool made at Oxford — including Prince Hassan of Jordan — form the basis of what he calls his "network for Israeli businesses to reach the Arab world, and for Arab entrepreneurs to reach Israel."

In late 1991, he founded Jaffa Communications, which, in addition to advertising, also provides services such as research, surveys, marketing and business consulting.

"Our secret — well, it's an open secret — is that we are Arabs in Israel and know both markets," he says.

This means knowing how to get the right message across in the best way. Any English speaker who has been treated to misspelled, poorly translated Hebrew ad campaigns can appreciate Khoury Machool's ironclad rule: "We do not translate campaigns. If we did, the campaign would lose all content."

He continues: "Many advertisers are unaware of the local Arab sector, one million people who need consumer goods, food, women's items, children's items and services.

"Part of the advertising done in Hebrew is supposed to appeal to the Arab sector and does not."

The most effective means of communication in the Arab sector, he says, is radio, then wall posters. There are no posters affixed to bus stops in Arab areas.

In the Jewish sector, marketing directly to the home is perceived as an annoyance, but among Arabs, he says, "People like to have visitors come to the home. It is considered impressive, an honor."

Another difference is the ranking of TV advertising and the print media. Fifteen per cent of the Israeli Arab population read the Hebrew press, but, says Khoury Machool, they do so to get information; they are not open to advertisers' messages.

For advertisers to deliver their message to the Arab sector, he says, "they must rely on alternative sources."

And Khoury Machool's agenda is far-reaching. Israeli Arabs have gone through a speeded-up modernization process, he says.

Income levels have increased, consumption patterns have changed and the level of education has risen.

Aware of his target audience, he explains his approach. "We use gentle humor, without making fun. You need to give respect."

TIPS FROM PROS

By JEFF ANSELL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Effective presentations should be a two-way dialogue between the audience and the speaker.

Imagine two close friends having a lively discussion about politics, a movie or a recent business deal. Although they aren't completely conscious of it, both are working very hard to understand what the other is saying, explain their own point of view and evaluate each other's response.

Both are constantly changing their inflection and using facial expressions and gestures. They look intently at one another and often pause for emphasis and to make sure the other person is following them. Occasionally, the two break off into excited agreement because some kind of understanding has been reached and a kind of connection has occured from this sharing of ideas.

It is hard to share ideas and spark understanding in a presentation, especially when the physical separation of standing before an audience sometimes translates into a kind of psychological isolation. The speaker feels pressure and may abandon his or her natural style of communicating.

Although the presenter usually does most, if not all, of the talking, a presentation is really a kind of conversation and all the usual rules apply.

A successful presenter involves the audience by generating a kind of mental conversation in which the listener evaluates, manipulates and modifies each idea as his or her own.

This cannot work if the presenter reads hurriedly through a prepared text, looks down at notes, talks in a monotone and kèeps arms pinned to the sides. When that happens, the audience's eyes are bound to glaze over — just as they would if someone behaved that way during a normal conversation.

The key lies in learning to "talk" your presentation by:

- Trying to make your presentation as two-way as possible.
- Visualizing.
- Maintaining strong eye contact.
- Pausing.
- Gesturing.

Talking your presentation will make you a more dynamic and credible speaker. But to create a true dialogue, speakers must also be sensitive to the audience's information needs. Rather than focusing solely on what they think is important, good presenters try to see things from the audience's perspective and to give them news they can use. You can do this by having a clear focus, with three or four key points, and by explaining your messages in a way the audience will find relevant and interesting.

One of those ways may be through visual aids. For maximum impact, use visual aids sparingly:

- Instead of relying on acetates for every presentation, consider using props, charts, videos or handouts.
- Handouts should be given out as they're discussed, or after the presentation.
- Charts should be easy to understand without little verbal explanation.
- All messages should be clear and readable from the back of the room and presented in large, bold type.
- Overhead transparencies should be uncluttered. Never place more than 12 to 15 words on each screen or the audience will be unable to retain the information.
- Horizontal transparencies and slides work better than vertical ones.
- Don't use boring slides — if they aren't compelling, the darkened room will make your audience tune out quickly.
- Know in advance who will operate audio-visual equipment and practice in advance to ensure a smooth delivery.

When fielding Q and As keep in mind that questions are generally a positive sign, because they show involvement and participation from the audience.

Questions give participants the opportunity to:

- Clarify information.
- Gather additional information.
- Test your credibility.

Remember that most questions are not objections. Treating every question as an objection becomes confrontational and will discourage people from participating.

No matter how small and insignificant it may seem to you, treat each question with respect. If one person asks, chances are others are wondering the same thing.

Sunnybrook Foods

By SYLVIA PAPERNICK

TORONTO — For three generations Sunnybrook Foods has been serving the needs of the Jewish community, with the city's largest selection of kosher foods.

Importers of a wide variety of products from the United States, Israel and beyond, they are a favorite shopping destination for many families.

David Goodbaum, vice-president and general manager, explains that Sunnybrook is able to keep prices down on kosher products by buying in large quantities. Their kosher foods are 10 to 15 per cent cheaper on average than at their competitors and they keep their prices low every day.

There are three Toronto locations, including the store on Bayview south of Highway 7. Now in its second year, the Bayview store boasts a large selection of kosher products, a full-service kosher meat department and items of a gourmet nature.

Goodbaum notes that "people have a certain hesitancy to purchase gourmet items in a traditional supermarket. The irony is you pay a tremendous premium when buying from a gourmet shop."

He says the customer pays a higher price to cover the retailer's fancy fixtures and high rent in downtown locations.

Specialty food and gourmet shops have taken away a lot of business from supermarkets, says Goodbaum. There has been a definite fragmentation in food retailing. Today's busy schedules provide less time for shopping, and often it is convenience that dictates where food dollars are spent.

He says people are also buying household items in places like Canadian Tire and Price Club, which are "very aggressive in terms of pricing. The food market is being taken out of the hands of traditional food retailers."

People are tending to shop more frequently and shopping from meal to meal is more common, he says.

And another reflection of today's fast-paced lifestyle is the availability of prepared foods, which sell well in the Bayview store. The Wilmington store, Goodbaum observes, has a more traditional clientele, one not as quick to buy prepared foods.

Last Passover, Sunnybrook began importing foods from South Africa, a mature manufacturing market with good quality products, many of which are kosher.

Free trade

"We start thinking about Passover a good two-and-a-half sometimes three months before," Goodbaum says. Canadian suppliers do not pay duty on U.S. imports for Passover because they are considered religious items.

Free trade has not yet had a great effect on the food industry. However with the introduction of the GST where there was once a hidden tax on foods, the customer must now pay an additional seven per cent on many items.

As a result, Sunnybrook prices are marked down so that there is still some savings for the customer. Some prices are actually cheaper now than they were 10 years ago. In the food industry, inflation has been kept at zero.

Goodbaum says certain trends are evident in food shopping today. The quality of frozen foods has improved substantially, and people are not buying canned produce the way they used to.

There is a "full complement of fruits and vegetables available all season long, which historically weren't available." With the Chilean market and other tropical markets exporting their produce, strawberries and other more unusual fruits are now available year round.

Goodbaum notes other changes. "Consumption of red meat has declined steadily and poultry is picking up the slack. When we first introduced ground chicken, we threw most of it away." Now people are purchasing ground chicken instead of beef. Turkey, which used to be mainly a seasonal item, is now being sold regularly.

In addition, "people are reading labels and the manufacturers are responding accordingly," with the emphasis on less salt and sugar.

Billed as the Kosher Specialists, Sunnybrook will continue to provide the best in kosher foods.

"We've got to keep carving out a niche for ourselves. Our future is really with the stores that cater to a Jewish clientele," Goodbaum believes.

"The key to retail is to exceed expectations," he says. Sunnybrook Foods will continue introducing new products that are kosher, always with the emphasis on customer service and quality. There's nothing about that policy that's not kosher.

Kids' lit store thrives

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In 1974 Judy Sarick gave up a prestigious administrative position at the Toronto Board of Education to open The Children's Book Store, the first book store in Toronto to cater exclusively to children.

"Nobody could understand why I would leave a well-paying job," Sarick said. "My father was hysterical. He thought I would never make a living."

But she proved her father wrong. This year The Children's Book Store is celebrating its 20th anniversary. Sarick also branched out into the wholesale market and now the business occupies a space more than 10 times the size of the original store.

The Saricks bought and renovated the former YWCA building at 2532 Yonge St., a three-level, 10,000-square foot art deco structure, and moved the store from Markham Street a year ago.

When the store first opened, Sarick couldn't afford to hire any staff. Her husband, Hy, who was tired of commuting between Kingston and Toronto, left his teaching position at Queen's University to help out "temporarily."

Today there are 30 employees, but Hy never did leave the Children's Book Store. He found a niche for himself in children's music, an area virtually untapped back in the early '70s.

Sarick, a specialist in children's literature since 1962, said she went into the business because she was convinced there was a market for high quality children's books.

Her job at the school board gave her access to quality books available only in libraries, and she would buy them from the wholesalers to give as gifts, she said. "The parents went wild over them."

These type of parents were her targeted market group, she said. "I thought if I could get 600 people to spend $100 on books for their kids, I could make this work."

Sarick's instincts were right. "We were an instant success," she said. "It was as if there was a market waiting there for us. My first year [sales] figures were double the projections."

In 1978 Sarick went into wholesaling. Today the wholesale business makes up 75 per cent of the annual sales. "We're a big book store and a small wholesaler," Sarick said.

She said business can be tougher for book stores than for other retail stores because unit costs are low and there's only a 40 per cent sales margin.

Sarick said there has been too much growth in children's publishing. In the United States more than 4,000 new children titles are published annually, she said, and "it's too many. . . . They can't sell that many titles."

The Saricks are selective about what they carry in the store. They promote quality children's writers and entertainers by inviting them to the store to read or perform. Raffi, the highly successful children's entertainer, and author Patti Stren were featured at the store this fall.

The two have a long association with the store. In fact, Hy Sarick is credited with launching Raffi's career. In 1976 Raffi approached the store about carrying his first record: after listening to it, Hy Sarick ordered 25 copies, he told The CJN. "[Raffi] was a bit overwhelmed that we would sell so many."

Sarick is considered by many to be the godfather of Canadian children's music, because The Children's Book store was one of the first places to promote major children's entertainers like Raffi, Sharon, Lois and Bram, and Fred Penner. What little was available sold quickly. "The record companies were shocked," he said. "They didn't think there was any money in children's music."

Three years ago Hy Sarick established a new company, The Children's Group, to market the Classical Kids series, the brainchild of Sue Hammond. The audio series incorporates music and narration to introduce children to classical composers.

It was a hard sell, but the series has taken off in North America, proving sceptics in the music industry wrong again, Sarick said. "It gives me great satisfaction to know that my instincts were right. . . . which proves there's always room for innovation."

Israeli court grants gays landmark victory

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice handed Israel's gay community a major victory last week, ruling that a company must extend the same benefits to gay couples that it does to heterosexual couples.

In the landmark 50-page decision, the court ordered El Al Airlines to grant the partner of steward Jonathan Danilovitz an annual free ticket and other benefits the company has long extended to heterosexual couples.

The ruling brought to an end a five-year legal journey that wound through Israel's court system, reaching the High Court after El Al appealed a labor court ruling in favor of Danilovitz, a native South African.

The decision was based on an amendment to Israel's basic law for equal rights in the workplace, which bans discrimination based on sexual orientation.

The High Court ruling drew the ire of Israel's religious political parties.

Knesset member Shlomo Benizri of Shas said his party views the decision as "a challenge to the sacred values of Judaism." He added that his party was planning to take steps in the wake of the ruling, but declined to specify what they would be.

Gay rights activists hailed the decision, saying it would have far-reaching implications for Israeli society, which is regarded as conservative when it comes to homosexuality.

"I feel this is a major breakthrough on several levels. One of the justices explicitly said the decision is based not only on the law itself, but on the principle of equality of all human beings," said Amit Kama, executive director of the Society for the Protection of Personal Rights.

"I believe that as long as our laws and court decisions are tolerant and liberal and pro-gay, then more and more people and heterosexuals will get rid of homophobia. Homosexuals and lesbians will feel more comfortable to come out in the workplace, to be open about themselves," said Kama.

The ruling held personal significance for Kama. He and his partner, a full-time professor at Tel Aviv University, have sued the school to grant Kama the social benefits given spouses of university employees.

It could also affect the case of Adir Steiner, who has unsuccessfully sought pension rights from the Army after the death two years ago of his partner, the late Chief Army Medical Officer, Col. Doron Meisel.

U.S. visitor named two-millionth tourist

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — When Marian Graves, the wife of a Baptist pastor from Albany, N.Y., boarded an El Al plane to fulfil her life's dream of seeing Israel, she never dreamed that she would be met at the airport with music, flowers, and a greeting from the prime minister.

Graves, who came for an eight-day tour together with a group from the Welcome Chapel Baptist Church in Albany, where her husband, Robert, is pastor, was told during the flight that she was designated as Israel's two-millionth tourist this year.

"I didn't know what was going on. I'm still in a state of shock," she said, as Tourism Minister Uzi Baram met her on the tarmac.

Inside the terminal, Baram presented Graves with a check for $1,447, the price of the airfare and tour package.

Graves, who is visiting for the first time, said she would consider her visit a blessing for the rest of her life.

"It is something you don't have time to do when you're busy raising a family," said Graves, who has six grown children.

Speaking at the ceremony, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin welcomed her and said she was an example to American Jews, only 11 per cent of whom have visited Israel.

"The Holy Land is a place where everyone should come and, according to his religious belief, see the shrines of the Bible, the New Testament, or the Koran, as well as the return to Zion, which is spoken of in the Bible," Rabin said.

"I hope that in the future there will be a tourism package of Israel, Jordan, Egypt, and Syria as well," Rabin added.

U.S. report supports PLO's move towards peace

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A second U.S. State Department report certifying PLO compliance with its peace agreements with Israel has drawn sharp criticism from members of Congress and some pro-Israel activists.

While citing PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat's failure to root out terrorism, confiscate weapons, prosecute Palestinian terrorists and amend the PLO covenant calling for the destruction of Israel, the report rules that the PLO's "good faith" effort warrants the determination.

The report, mandated every six months according to legislation passed by Congress, paves the way for President Bill Clinton to authorize financial assistance to the Palestinians.

White House officials say Clinton plans to adopt the report's recommendation and ask Congress for an allocation of up to $150 million (US) for the Palestinian Authority (PA), which governs the autonomous areas of Gaza and Jericho.

The administration has pledged a total of $500 million over five years to the Palestinians.

At the same time, however, the report — and the reaction it has elicited — is expected to become a weapon in the ongoing battle on Capitol Hill over continuing U.S. aid to the Palestinians.

The 13-page State Department report, released last Friday, details dozens of incidents of PLO actions that contradict its peace accord signed with Israel last year. But it also seeks to explain some of the PLO actions.

For example, the report cites Arafat's Nov. 15 comments at a Gaza rally, during which he called Israel "the Zionist enemy."

"While this remark is reminiscent of an earlier era before the PLO acknowledged Israel's right to exist, the broader pattern of Arafat's actions and statements demonstrates his acceptance of Israel and commitment to the negotiations," the report states.

The report also praised Arafat for turning over to Israeli forces a murder suspect hiding in Gaza.

The report's mild language and conciliatory approach toward the Palestinians prompted a flurry of criticism, with some activists accusing the State Department of adhering to a low standard and a minimalist definition of compliance.

Expressing "disappointment" with the findings, Steve Grossman, president of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, said, "The time has come for Arafat to ratchet up his compliance with his commitments."

"If the Israeli people, the American people and Congress are going to have full faith in Arafat, then he needs to be more assiduous and steadfast in his efforts," Grossman said.

Although critical of the report and of some of Arafat's actions, Grossman said that AIPAC continues to support American aid to the PA.

In contrast, the Zionist Organization of America was not only sharply critical of the report, but also plans to challenge continued aid to the Palestinians.

"The State Department has ignored, minimized and whitewashed the PLO's numerous and serious violations," said ZOA President Morton Klein.

"The report is simply a farce that refuses to look truth in the eye," Klein said.

State Department officials have defended the report's findings and its purpose.

"We need to weigh the need for aid to the Palestinians against a higher standard of compliance," a State Department official said.

"Any cutoff of American aid or a perceived weakening of American support for the Palestinian Authority could have catastrophic effects for the Palestinians, Israelis and the entire peace process," the official said.

Israeli officials, from Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on down, have expressed similar views, strongly lobbying in favor of U.S. aid to the Palestinians, despite reservations about compliance.

Jerusalem to host AIDS conference in '95

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem will serve as the host city of the next international AIDS education conference, due to take place in November 1995, according to the Jerusalem AIDS Project.

The group made the announcement last Thursday to coincide with international commemorations of World AIDS Day.

AIDS educators and activists in Israel, who have repeatedly warned the public against complacency toward the deadly disease, say they hope that next year's gathering will boost awareness of AIDS in Israel.

According to Health Ministry figures, 307 Israelis have developed full-blown AIDS since the first case of the disease was recorded about 10 years ago. About two-thirds of them have died.

There are some 1,226 known individuals with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS (see News in Brief, p. 2).

But the ministry estimates that the actual number, including those who are afraid to be tested for the disease, is between 2,000 and 2,500.

"Right now, we have small numbers in comparison to other countries, but this is (false) because of collective denial," AIDS counselor Rachel Hayward told Israel Television.

"There are a lot of people who are probably walking around infected with HIV, but they aren't getting tested because they are afraid to go somewhere where people might recognize them, or they are afraid to lose their jobs," she said.

Israel marked World AIDS Day with a number of educational and prevention programs. Information booths were set up around the country, condoms were distributed and free AIDS testing was made available at such places as Tel Aviv University and Ben-Gurion Airport.

Palestinians collect taxes from Arabs in West Bank

According to the self-rule accord signed last year in Washington, the troop withdrawal should take place prior to the holding of Palestinian elections.

Last week, some Israeli government officials spoke out about renegotiating the timetable of the self-rule accord.

Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin told Israeli Radio that there was no point in being stuck in negotiations over an interim arrangement — which covers the first five years of Palestinian self-rule — and that it would be more effective to move ahead with negotiations on a permanent arrangement.

The permanent-status talks, which will cover such issues as settlements and who will control Jerusalem, are scheduled to begin in May 1996.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin lashed out at Beilin for his remarks, saying, "The government will continue its policy toward negotiations on the interim arrangement."

Beilin, one of the architects of the self-rule accord signed last year in Washington, offered his view of a final-status arrangement: A confederation between Jordan and the Palestinian entity, full demilitarization in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, changes to the 1967 borders and a Jerusalem united under Israeli rule.

As a result of Thursday's transfers of authority, the Palestinians will now be responsible for collecting some $96 million in taxes from Arab residents of the West Bank. The agreement does not include Israelis who live in the territories.

Mohammed Nashashibi, the PA official in charge of finance, said he believed the self-rule government would be able to install the necessary mechanisms to collect these fees.

In preparation for the transfer, the PA has been recruiting tax and customs employees. Most Palestinians previously involved in such work resigned during the intifada because they viewed Israel's taxation of the territories as part of the government's oppression of Palestinians.

In recent weeks, officials have been undergoing training, and Israel will provide consultation services for the next six months.

And large advertisements have been placed in Arabic dailies seeking recruits for training in income tax and Value Added Tax collection, and calling for public cooperation with the tax authorities.

In the area of health services, meanwhile, the Palestinians have an annual budget of some $33 million and some 2,000 Palestinian employees.

Health and taxation are considered more problematic than education — handed over in August — and welfare and tourism, transferred three weeks ago.

An Israeli civil administration spokesman said it would be up to the PA to decide if it wants to maintain any relationship with the Israeli medical system.

Israeli soldier killed in Afula

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — An axe-wielding Islamic militant killed a 19-year-old Israeli soldier in the northern town of Afula last Wednesday.

The soldier, Sgt. Liat Gabai, was standing at a bus stop some 50 metres from the Afula police station when the assailant approached, pulled an axe from under his coat and struck her several times on the head and throat.

She was treated at the scene by medics and then rushed, with the axe still in her head, to the local Afula hospital. She was then flown by an army helicopter to Rambam Hospital in Haifa, where she died shortly after admission.

The assailant, who was seized by passers-by and police summoned from the station, was identified as Wahib Abu Alrub, 25, from a village near the West Bank town of Jenin.

Alrub told security officials that he had gone to Afula to attack a soldier in order to prove his worthiness as a member of the mainstream Al Fatah movement of the PLO.

But Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Alrub had been detained by Israeli security officials several times in the past and that he was a known member of Hamas, which has claimed responsibility for a recent spate of terror attacks on Israelis.

His brother is reportedly serving a prison term in Israel for his involvement with Hamas.

Noting that the suspect did not have an entry permit for Israel, Rabin said the attack should not be blamed on lax security by the Palestinian Authority, since Alrub came from an area of the West Bank still under Israeli control.

"We shall continue on our road to peace and to fight those who oppose it," he said.

Confronted by a mounting terror campaign, Israeli security officials have launched a massive manhunt in the West Bank for suspected Hamas members.

Security forces and soldiers last week arrested some 40 members of a Hamas cell, averting at least two planned suicide bombings against Israelis, the Army announced.

Among those arrested were several Palestinians who allegedly helped Salah Assawi when he carried out the Oct. 19 suicide bombing of a bus in Tel Aviv that killed 22 Israelis.

Suspects told investigators that two attacks were being planned in Petach Tikva and near a Jewish settlement in the West Bank.

Islamic Jihad gunmen killed

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Three gunmen believed to be members of Islamic Jihad for Palestine were killed in a clash with IDF troops inside the security zone last Monday.

One soldier was slightly wounded in the clash, which involved houses-to-house fighting after a chase.

The terrorists had apparently set up an ambush and were waiting to attack an IDF patrol or convoy.

Instead, members of the Israeli unit opened fire.

Palestinians charged

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Two Palestinians from eastern Jerusalem have been charged with complicity in the kidnapping and murder of Israeli soldier Nachshon Waxman.

The two were remanded in custody until the proceedings against them have been concluded.

International inaction sinks morale in Sarajevo

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The collapse of American and the United Nations' resolve to stop Bosnian Serb aggression is plunging the inhabitants of Sarajevo deeper into despair, according to the president of the besieged city's Jewish community.

"It's desperate. The Serbs continue to shell and to sniper," said Ivan Ceresnjec, president of Sarajevo's 600-member Jewish community.

The Clinton administration last week dropped its call to use air strikes and other forms of military intervention to pressure Bosnian Serbs to stop their attacks. Now, echoing their European allies, the United States is saying that the road to peace must be paved by further concessions from Bosnians.

Many American Jewish groups, comparing the situation in the former Yugoslavia with the Holocaust, have urged the government to take more forceful action.

After the administration made clear it was backing away from that position, Jewish groups expressed their disappointment.

"We are witnessing the ultimate tragedy in the horrible conflict in Bosnia, and that is the failure of the international community to mobilize an effective response that would bring an end to the war," said Lynn Lyss, chair of the National Jewish Community Relations Council.

"There is enormous frustration in the Jewish community about what is transpiring in Bosnia and the gross lack of international will to act," she said.

One small piece of good news for Sarajevo is expected this week, however, as an aid convoy of food, medical supplies and clothing organized by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee made its way to the city.

It was the first such convoy in four months.

In recent weeks, as Bosnian Muslim forces began what proved to be an unsuccessful offensive, rumors circulated that the Serbs "would take revenge on Sarajevo (Bosnia's capital) because they have Sarajevo in the palm of their hand," Ceresnjec said.

The failure of the offensive, and the apparent Western acquiescence to the Serb counteroffensive, have only further lowered morale.

As of last week, Bosnian Serb forces stationed a surface-to-air missile system within range of the Sarajevo airport, 200 km to the southeast, and threatened any flights attempting to arrive or depart from there.

"The airport is still closed," said Ceresnjec. "People feel abandoned from the rest of the world. Every time it's worse because people are losing their strength.

"It's 32 months of siege, and generally nothing has changed. You still have 300,000 people stuck in what looks like the biggest concentration camp in history," he said.

Ceresnjec spoke to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency by telephone from Berlin, where he was opening a photographic exhibition on the Sarajevo Jewish community, which has provided food, medicines and supplies to Jews and non-Jews alike during the siege.

Last week, the first convoy of aid to the community since August departed from the JDC warehouses in Split, on the Adriatic coast.

The five trucks, containing 100 tons of food, medicine and winter clothing were scheduled to arrive in Sarajevo last Wednesday.

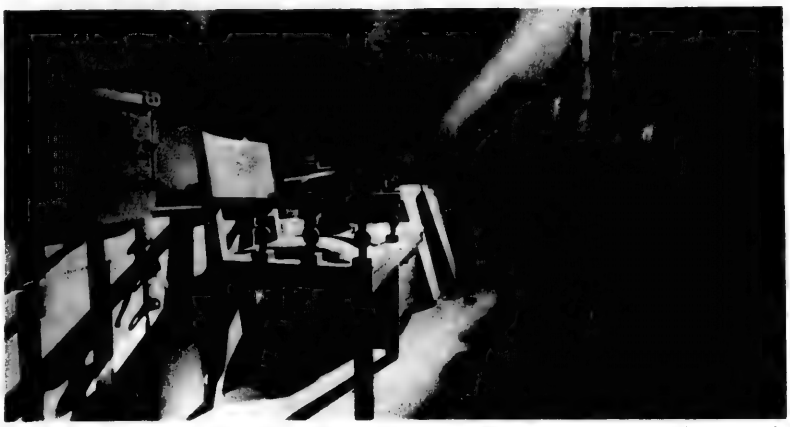
"The contents of the trucks have come from Christian, Muslim and Jewish organizations around the world, mostly from Europe," said Yechiel Bar-Chaim, the JDC's director for the former Yugoslavia.

At the moment, there are no more evacuations planned for the Jews of Sarajevo.

"The people who have stayed after 30 months of war are people who want to stay. Whether the latest turn of events will change the situation, we don't know. Certainly, if there are people who want to come out, we will bring them out," said Bar-Chaim.

The JDC's last evacuation was in February.

Another, non-JDC evacuation effort led in July to the arrest and interrogation of the Sarajevo Jewish community's vice president, Danilo Nikolic, as well as other Jewish figures.



During the current war, collections of the Jewish Museum of Bosnia-Herzegovina have been packed into crates, its windows filled with sandbags. [Edward Serotta photo]

All those arrested were eventually released, and their passports and other confiscated documents were returned by September.

The community was concerned about the arrests, but is hopeful they are a thing of the past.

"That's just history. We hope it will not be repeated," said Ceresnjec.

A view of downtown Frankfurt includes a look at the Jewish Museum.

Rothschild mansion houses museum

By SANDFORD BORINS
Special to The CJN

FRANKFURT — Entering the Jewish Museum of Frankfurt to see its current exhibit about the Rothschilds, my eyes were immediately drawn to an immense ivory horn mounted in elaborate Gothic silver-gilt.

The horn, once considered the zenith of German medieval metalwork, is now known to be a forgery produced last century.

I thought of Hemingway's retort to Fitzgerald: "The rich are different from us only because they have more money." The Rothschilds, like any of us could be, were the victims of hoax, albeit a high-priced one.

The Jewish Museum was itself once a Rothschild mansion. Located along the fashionable river Main, the museum's rooms display the rich trappings of an ostentatious life: carved wood panelling, elaborate ceilings, inlaid furniture and sumptuous objets d'art.

However, The Rothschilds: A European Family takes the visitor back to their beginnings on Frankfurt's Judengasse. It is a fascinating documentary, with focus on the Rothschild family's public image and philanthropy. The German words have been translated into English.

The patriarch of the Rothschild family, Meyer Amschel, was born 250 ago in the Frankfurt ghetto. He had a traditional Jewish education and lived in the ghetto as a devout Orthodox Jew for his entire life.

Amschel, like most 18th-century Jewish bankers, helped European rulers to raise money through bonds. What differentiated Amschel from the others was his dealings in precious coins. This gained him entree into the European courts, where Amschel cultivated kings and slowly built a reputation as a reliable financier.

While Amschel lived in Frankfurt's Judengasse, he travelled extensively and recognized a future beyond the ghetto walls. His five sons entered the business, and four left Frankfurt to establish branches in London, Paris, Vienna and Naples.

The Rothschilds business really took off during the Napoleonic wars. Its capital base increased twelvefold between 1815 and 1818.

The Rothschilds knew two factors were critical to their success: quick access to information from all over Europe and family solidarity. They maintained agents throughout Europe to gather news and private couriers to relay it. They wrote letters in German using Hebrew characters to foil government censors. They even trained carrier pigeons.

Two years before he died, Meyer Amschel made his five sons partners in the family business. The sons married within the family to keep its fortune intact.

The exhibit shows matriarch Gutle Amschel, who died at 96, was a formidable presence in keeping the family together. Her descendants often visited her Frankfurt home and she instilled in the younger generation an awareness of their roots in the Judengasse.

While the exhibit shows the opulence of Rothschild home life, it is clear that indolence was not tolerated. The children received a rigorous Jewish and secular education — one chart shows a demanding weekly timetable of studies. While the women did not participate in the business, they were expected to exemplify the mitzvah of tzedakah.

Museum visitors learn how the Rothschilds struggled for Jewish emancipation. Meyer Amschel's grandson Lionel, first elected to parliament in 1847, refused to swear the required oath of office "in the true faith of a Christian." He refused to take his seat until the oath was amended 11 years later.

Edmond de Rothschild, another grandson, spent his fortune buying land for Jewish settlers and establishing businesses in Palestine in the 1880s.

The Rothschilds were, and are, a strongly Jewish family and as such, The Rothschilds: A European Family is a must-see for the Jewish traveller.

VISITOR INFORMATION

The Rothschilds: A European Family is one view until Feb. 27, 1995. The Jewish Museum of Frankfurt is located at Untermainkai 14-15 and is closed Mondays. Entrance is $9.

Accompanying the exhibit is a lecture series, five seminars on the Rothschild's wine business and film seminars, some in English. For information, call the museum at 49-69-212-35000.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

"Oy Vay!": Due to the antics of a mischievous Chanukah gremlin, the photograph that accompanied last week's column, showing a mother and six children at Jackson's Point in 1958, was incorrectly captioned. The family shown was none other than my own. Left to right: Shirley Gladstone and Marci, Howard, Bill, Martin, Bonnie and Brian. Thankfully, all possess a good sense of humor. Apologies to author Ken Sherman and family.

The mix-up occurred after I hastily labeled this treasured family photo with what seems in retrospect to be an ambiguous caption, then sent it to The CJN as I was leaving for the airport to board a flight to Paris. The gremlin took over from there.

Feeling A Little Bit Goofy: Instead of going right into the French capital from Charles de Gaulle airport, I paid 75 francs ($21) for transport via motorcoach to Euro Disney, the billion-dollar mega-resort that the Disney Corporation opened 35 km east of Paris in April 1992. Arriving at such an Americanized destination, with its mammoth Main Street U.S.A. and its six large U.S.-style hotels, made me feel, well, more than a little bit goofy. Was this really France? Why hadn't I gone to Orlando instead?

Country-and-western music echoed through the lobby as I checked into the Sequoia Lodge, which evokes the rustic atmosphere of a Rocky Mountain hostelry. The rooms, which go from about $147 in low season, are comfortably furnished in an Old West motif — except, of course, for the Mickey Mouse soap and Mickey Mouse shampoo in the bathroom. A similar Western theme is reflected in the furnishings of Hotel Cheyenne and Hotel Santa Fe, while the decors of Hotel New York and Newport Bay Club are more glossy and modern. The flagship property is The Disneyland Hotel, which resembles a turreted Victorian resort, with rooms starting at $462 (low season).

A 10-minute walk from the hotel, around an artificial lake, brought me to the park gates, where low-season admittance, including unlimited access to all rides and attractions, costs $49 for adults, $35 for children. (Free for children under three.) As at other Disney theme parks, Main Street U.S.A. features numerous attractions, shops and restaurants, all reflecting the atmosphere of a small town in the American Midwest at the turn of the century. Prices at its various eateries, however, are thoroughly modern: a plain tuna sandwich costs $8 and a small bag of sugared popcorn is $4.20. I particularly liked the Discovery Arcade, which celebrates the unveiling in 1886 of the Statue of Liberty, France's memorable gift to America.

Beyond Main Street lie four themed "lands," all connected by tram: Frontierland, which mirrors a boom town of the Gold Rush; Adventureland, which provides jungle adventures in Africa and the Caribbean; Fantasyland, which features such make-believe characters as Sleeping Beauty (La Belle au Bois Dormant), Peter Pan, the Mad Hatter, Pinocchio and Dumbo the Flying Elephant; and Discoveryland, which offers a glimpse of the future as imagined by Jules Verne and other 19th century visionaries.

Despite my underlying belief that building fairy-tale castles in Europe seems patently foolish when there are so many real ones around, I found myself genuinely intrigued by the fanciful, storybook design of the buildings. Philippe Ravanas, a corporate communications officer for Euro Disney, told me that the architects found inspiration in the works of Leonardo da Vinci, Jules Verne, H.G. Wells and other pre-20th century thinkers who dared to imagine the future. "You're entering a future vision that came from the past," he said. How cleansing, how Norman Rockwellian, to imagine a Europe where the traumas of the 20th century never happened!

Last year, the park saw roughly 8.8 million visitors, some 40 per cent of them French. Although no other European attraction draws such crowds, Euro Disney — beset by high start-up costs, bad weather, dropping attendance and the European recession — has acquired billions of dollars in debts. However, Tinkerbell may yet wave her magic wand. Euro Disney officials are hopeful that a recent financial restructuring may resolve its monetary woes, and that its vast Euro Kingdom, however much it has trampled local sensibilities, will be preserved for future generations. When you wish upon a star . . .

A realistic account of Polish Jewry

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stepchild on the Vistula is a realistic account of the life of Polish Jewry. It mirrors the economic hardships and political ideologies that attracted youth in the 1920s and 1930s, without an overlay of sentimentality.

The novel by well known Toronto writer Simcha Simchovitch has just been translated from Yiddish into English and is available for $12.50 at Jewish bookstores.

Stepchild on the Vistula tells of the childhood and coming of age of an intelligent and sensitive Jewish youngster, against the background of the ebullient Jewish life in Otwock (Otvotsk), a resort city of 10,000 Jews south of Warsaw.

It is also available from Lugus Publishing, 48 Falcon St., Toronto, M45 2P5, (416) 322-5113, or from the author, 635-7199.

Small isle a popular attraction

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

CORAL ISLAND — Coral Island, a small isle 13 km offshore from Eilat, was a popular seaside attraction for Israelis during the years when Israel occupied the Sinai.

Although Israel handed back Coral Island to Egypt when it returned the Sinai in 1974, visitors from Israel continue to make day-trips there via ferry from Eilat, taking advantage of the open border between the two countries since the Camp David accords. A visa is required, which may take several days to procure, but those who make the trip say it is well worth it.

Situated near the Egyptian resort of Taba, the island the Egyptians call Gazirat Faraun (Pharoah Island) features a fortress built by the Sultan Saladdin in the 12th century CE to protect vital Red Sea trading routes and ward off Christian Crusaders.

Besides the impressive remains of Saladdin's fortress, from which an Egyptian flag now flies, the corals surrounding the isle make it an excellent spot for divers. As the island has no overnight accommodations, most visitors come for only a few hours.

A peculiar mix of geography and politics has made Coral Island one of few places in the region where visitors from Israel, Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia converge. Boatloads of tourists regularly arrive from Egypt and from Aqaba, Jordan. Saudi nationals who cross the international border into Jordan, only a few kilomeres away, sometimes take the ferry to Coral Island from Aqaba.

"We stare at each other and keep away from each other," an experienced visitor to the island told me when I visited the island before the recently-declared peace with Jordan.

Although international visitors to Israel with visas are permitted to visit Coral Island, it is not an entry point into the Sinai. For that, travellers have to go to Nuweiba, further down the coast.

An underwater observatory

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

NASSAU, Bahamas — At 3 p.m. every day at Coral World here, a diver descends into the shallow, sunlight-dappled water surrounding the underwater observatory and distributes lunch to the hundreds of exotic fish that circle him.

Just a few feet away, on the other side of the glass, a crowd of spectators also circle as they watch enthusiastically, many holding full-color printed cards depicting more than 50 species of fish that swim in these waters.

The printed guides are free with admission into the marine park, and unless you're a marine biologist or avid seaquarium enthusiast, you'll have trouble telling a seahorse from red hind without one. Blue parrotfish, glasseye snapper, schoolmaster, sergeant major, yellow goatfish, French grunt and indigo hamlet are only a few of the species illustrated, with names frequently almost as colorful as the sea creatures themselves.

Smart visitors to the 16-acre aquatic attraction plan itineraries that bring them to the shark tank at 11 a.m., the stingray pool at 1 p.m., the reef tank at 2 p.m., the underwater observatory at 3 p.m. and the sea turtle pool at 4 p.m. Although these marine creatures are visible at all hours, they are most animated at feeding times.

And that leaves plenty of time to hear lectures on aquatic subjects on the half-hour, see the flamingos and touch starfish, conch, crabs, sea cucumbers and other shallow water inhabitants.

Seven years after its opening, Coral World remains one of Nassau's most popular attractions. The combination marine park and underwater observatory is one of four in the world.

An Israeli company built the first in 1973, shortly after the Arab-Israeli Yom Kippur War, in Eilat on the shore of the coral-rich Red Sea. Offering visitors a window into an undersea world previously accessible only to scuba divers, the concept proved a success.

Through a joint venture between Coral World and the Ampal-American Israel Corporation, a second Coral World opened in St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands, in 1979, and a third in Nassau in 1987. A fourth opened in Maui in 1991.

Like its sisters around the world, the Bahamian Coral World features an offshore tower, accessible by bridge from the mainland, in which visitors descend nearly four metres below sea level. A 360-degree panorama of thick glass reveals corals, sponges, eels, crabs, stingrays and a variety of brightly colored tropical fish in their natural setting. In effect, the humans are the ones in the aquarium, but the myriad specimens of marine life beyond the glass seem absolutely disinterested.

The Russian Century: A photographic History of Russia's 100 years; text by Brian Moynahan. Random House of Canada $63.00

For almost 80 years the Soviet Union was virtually invisible to the West. Visually it remained an almost unknown continent. The collapse of communism provided an opportunity to examine the strong photographic tradition that had been forced underground for several generations.

Two eager researchers went in search of unpublished photographs that would document the journey of the Russian people from the last days of the Tsars through the Bolshevik Revolution and the Cold War to the era of Gorbachev and Yeltsin.

Three hundred of the photographs they unearthed are included in this large, handsome, coffee-table book. The images open a hitherto closed window on a turbulent history.

The text — ample, clear and vivid — indicates that the Russian Empire at the turn of the century had a Jewish population of seven million. It included Yiddish speaking Ashkenazis, Iranian speaking Daghestanis and the Yehudis of Tashkant and Samarkand.

Anti-Semitic groups encouraged pogroms and accused Jews of the ritual murder of Christian babies. Constantine Pobednostsev, tutor and advisor to Tsar Nicholas revealed his solution to the Jewish question with brute simplicity. He advised that a third of the Jews should emigrate, a third should convert to Christianity and a third would die out.

In January 1935, the infamous Doctors Plot was unveiled by Stalin, involving a Jewish conspiracy to murder the Kremlin leadership. Rumors spread that all Jews would be deported to Siberia. Providentially, Stalin suffered a major stroke and his plans were aborted.

The photographs are, by turn, startling, poignant, portentous and horrifying. Many are unforgettable — an exotic Jewish family from the ancient community of Bokhara in Central Asia, Anna Pavlova resting after a ballet rehearsal, Leon Trotsky in uniform addressing a mass meeting, frozen German troops trying to cope with the rigors of a Russian winter, Andrei Sakherov lying in his bier as his wife Yelana Bonner keeps vigil. The renowned poet Yevgeny Yevtushenko has written a deeply felt forward, as well as a poem, Patchwork Quilt printed here for the first time.

This volume, both text and photographs is a many-sided depiction of a land and people.

Book of Fables: Yiddish Fable Collection of Reb Moshe Wallich, translated and edited by Eli Katz, Wayne State University Press

In the 17th century there appeared a collection of 34 fables in Yiddish, entitled Sefer Meshulim, in the tradition of Aesop and Arabic literature. Almost all were didactic in nature. A noteworthy feature of this anthology was 115 attractive woodcuts.

A surprising aspect of the fables was their down to earth presentation of everyday Jewish life. "Thus the stork in one fable is shown preparing kreplech, an explicitly Jewish delicacy for his guest; the crow in another fable demonstrates his fine voice by chanting the Jewish blessing of the new moon;... in still another fable a dog speaks to his prospective bride (a cow) of her wifely duties including that of regular attendance at the ritual bath."

The editor has made the Book of Fables accessible in a meticulous English translation, with a facsimile of the original Yiddish and the woodcuts. The result is a handsome book that will appeal to both the scholar and the general reader.

Correction

TORONTO — The name of a family loaning photographs to the exhibit 100 Years of Yiddish Canada at Beth Tzedec Congregation was incorrectly spelled in the Nov. 24 CJN. It should be Philip and Laura Kaplan.

AN ISRAELI POP STAR

Popular in Israel, Nini, under the name Noa, is trying to build her career in the United States. She recently was chosen to sing a peace song at the Vatican. It was the first time that a non-religious event had taken place in the Vatican and Noa is the first Israeli artist who has performed in front of the Pope.

King David, Superstar?: Alan Menken and Tim Rice, who won Academy Awards for their score of Walt Disney's Aladdin, are teaming up to write the music and libretto for a new musical, based on the life of the biblical King David. The proposed musical is set to debut in Jerusalem during that city's 3,000th-anniversary celebrations in 1996. Then it is scheduled to tour Israel and some 22 cities worldwide, including Paris, London, New York, Tokyo and Moscow.

"King David will be the most spectacular and dramatic production ever staged," says producer Andre Djaoui. "It will also convey a message of inspiration, hope and peace to the world... King David will tell the romantic, dramatic story of a warrior king who created and inspired a nation against all odds. Although the story is thousands of years old, it will have a resonance that will apply to the conditions prevailing today in the modern state of Israel."

In addition to Aladdin, Menken has a current Broadway stage success with the music for Beauty And The Beast (he co-wrote the original film score), while Rice co-wrote the score for the latest Disney animated movie, The Lion King. Rice was also librettist for Jesus Christ Superstar, Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, Evita and Cats.

...classic...timid writing

TORONTO — In a public discussion recently in Toronto, New York writer E. L. Doctorow likened the process of writing a novel to taking a journey by automobile at night.

"You can only see as far as your headlights go, but you can make the whole trip that way," he said.

The author of such celebrated works as Ragtime, The Book of Daniel, World's Fair, Billy Bathgate and his latest book, The Waterworks, Doctorow deflected several questions from the audience and moderator Rick Salutin. "There are some questions you have to leave to your readers and your critics — in fact, most of them," he said.

"It's hard enough writing these books. When it comes to your own work, you really don't want to know what you do."

Speaking at the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors, Doctorow said that he, like many writers of the Cold War era, has been greatly affected by the underlying political circumstances of this period.

"How can something that lasted 50 years not have an effect on the national psyche?" he asked.

The Waterworks, Doctorow said, emerged from a short story by the same name that he had written about 20 years ago. He said the story was based on a powerful mental image of an enormous indoor park, with steam rising out of grates and old men sitting around in a state of catatonia. He also saw a boy sailing a toy boat on a municipal reservoir and a man being chased.

"I, too, wondered what had gone on. I didn't understand what I had written. It was a dream story. I thought about it for 20 years . . . The novel The Waterworks was an exegesis of the story."

Doctorow said his grandparents were Jewish immigrants who came as children to America about 1880.

"The women all seemed to be observant if not pious, and the men were all trade-union socialists and human secularists in their sensibility. My grandfather had this socialist idea that all problems of earth could be solved on earth. You didn't have to wait."

By an extraordinary coincidence, his mother named him after Edgar Allan Poe, one of the pre-eminent literary figures of 19th century America. "I suppose in her fantasy I was going to be a writer," he said. "I was born with a name."

Tracking down the Torah scrolls of Polna

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Charles Heller wanted to know what happened to the Torah scrolls of Polna, Czechoslovakia, his family's ancestral home for more than 200 years.

The Toronto man recently visited the Czech Memorial Scrolls Centre in Knightsbridge, England, to find out. The centre houses recovered Torah scrolls, which it distributes to communities throughout the world.

Heller, a Peel Board of Education music teacher and choir director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehudah Synagogue, learned that three sifrei Torahs from Polna had survived and been sent to new homes.

It is the centre's policy not to disclose the locations to prevent people claiming attachment to the scrolls from pestering the receipients. The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation are known to have restored Czechoslovakian scrolls.

When his father, Otto Heller, escaped from Czechoslovakia in 1939, he knew a serious fate awaited the Jews. During the war, the Jews of Polna were deported to Auschwitz. Czechoslovakian synagogues were emptied of their contents. These were sent to Prague where they were sorted out by Jewish experts, who were themselves doomed. The religious items were to be exhibited by the Germans at a planned Museum of a Defunct Race.

Charles, who emigrated from England in 1977, had been told his grandfather Siegfried Heller stored the Polna sifrei Torah in his house during the notorious Polna Blood Libel. In 1899, the corpse of a murdered seamstress was found in nearby woods. Leopold Hilsner, a 22-year-old Jewish vagabond of low intelligence, was accused of the crime, found guilty and condemned to death.

Hilsner was then accused of another murder in a climate of virulent anti-Semitism. T.G. Masaryk, later the first president of Czechoslovakia, intervened and Hilsner was eventually pardoned. Charles says he read in a Czech newspaper that a very old gentile Czech man confessed to the crimes on his deathbed in the 1960s.

In 1964, the Westminster Synagogue in Knightsbridge took possession of more than 1,000 abandoned sifrei Torah. Many were bloodstained, some were charred by fire or damaged by water. In some instances, they were wrapped in personal clothing or in a tallis to protect them from harm. Many are beyond repair and are displayed as memorial scrolls.

Heller told The CJN that each year more scrolls are restored to their rightful place in Jewish life. He said the Memorial Scrolls Centre displays a graphic account of the story of the Czech scrolls. "Visitors learn something of the long history of the communities of Bohemia and Moravia where Jews lived for many centuries."

While at the centre, Charles was presented with a fragment of a tallis from Polna and other materials. "These," he said, "are the last remains of the Polna community."

Last remains

After leaving the centre and the synagogue, he learned that the Israeli embassy, a mile away, had been bombed.

"Such is Jewish history," Heller says. "Before one chapter closes, another one opens."

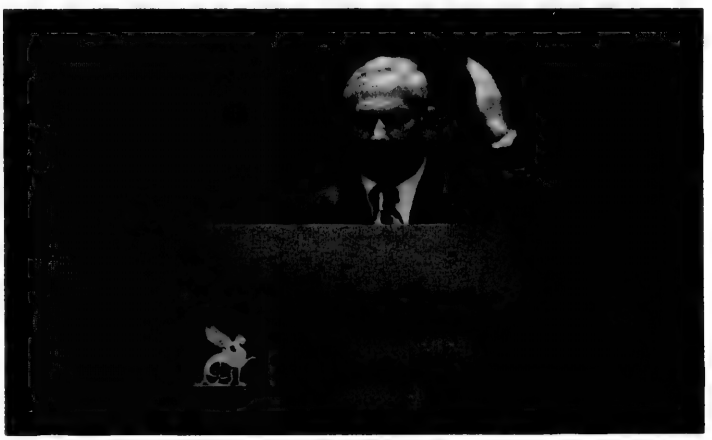
Vacated settlements will lead to war, Netanyahu warns

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter



Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu makes a point in a speech last week in Toronto. [Ron Csillag photo]

TORONTO — Last year's Oslo accord between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization is "a false peace" and an Arab "political tactic" intended to destroy the Jewish state, opposition Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu warned here last week.

If left unchanged, the accord will return Israel's "defensive walls" — Judea and Samaria — "to our enemies, who want to snuff out the Jewish state.

"But that's not going to happen," Netanyahu said in a near whisper. "I'm telling you that. Because we won't let it happen," he said to thunderous applause from the audience of over 1,000 at the Ford Performing Arts Centre.

In town to drum up support and funds for the Canadian Friends of Yesha — the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza — Netanyahu offered few concrete examples of how or whether a Likud-led government would back out of the accord's provision to cede the West Bank to eventual Palestinian control. Rather, he delivered spirited support for its Jewish settlers.

A "top priority" for Likud "is to ensure that the 140,000 Israelis there remain prosperous, secure and growing. I would like to see next year another 10 per cent increase [in the population]," Netanyahu said.

"We will not live without that wall. If we vacate Yesha, there will be war," he said bluntly. "There will be a descent into a catastrophic war. The battle for Yesha is the battle for the state of Israel."

The Oslo accord, which has already ceded the Gaza Strip and Jericho to Palestinian autonomy, is part of an Arab tactic that started after the 1967 Six Day War, he said.

While many Arab countries realized after 1967 that Israel could not be destroyed militarily and that peace was the sole option, some forces, including the PLO, sought to return the Jewish state to its narrow pre-war boundaries "and reduce Israel by stages, beginning with Judea and Samaria."

Now, Netanyahu said, Gaza "is a fortress of terror" that has resulted in the deaths of over 100 Israelis since the signing of the accord on the White House lawn last year.

"It gives me no pleasure to say, 'I told you so.'"

BB flip flops on PQ plan

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Although federalist politicians have called for a boycott of the Parti Quebecois' (PQ) planned commissions to hammer out the details of its draft sovereignty bill, not everyone in the Jewish community agrees.

On Dec. 6, Robert Libman, the former Equality Party leader who is now director of the Quebec office of B'nai Brith, urged "active participation" in the process by minority federalist groups, saying they could ill-afford to "sit on the sidelines."

Two days later in the National Assembly, Premier Jacques Parizeau cited B'nai Brith as an example of a federalist group open to its "consultation" process.

B'nai Brith then revised its earlier statement after it was accused of complying with the PQ agenda.

The B'nai Brith office received a number of calls from irate members of the Jewish community and from "several Liberal MNAs," Libman said.

Libman told The CJN B'nai Brith was leaving the door open to participation, but only under two strict conditions.

The first was that Parizeau had to make it clear that "dissident" groups would be permitted to present their cases at the forums.

The second, Libman said, was that B'nai Brith needs to consider the implications of not showing a united federalist front on the process.

CANADA

Meeting With Marchi

TORONTO — There is no such thing as a refugee from Israel, representatives of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) told Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi in a recent meeting.

Tensions between Canada and Israel go on because the Immigration and Refugee Board continues to accept Israeli citizens, most of them originally from the Soviet Union, as refugees who claim discrimination and persecution in the Jewish state.

The matter "is a Canadian problem that needs a Canadian solution," CJC president Irving Abella reportedly told Marchi.

Drug Programs

TORONTO — Yad BeYad, the summer volunteer program begun by management consultant Loretta Helman to teach English to Russian olim under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Forum, is branching out with a specialized week-long winter volunteer program.

Helman and five volunteer therapists will be in Israel later this month to present three programs developed by the Addiction Research Foundation. The presentations are under the auspices of Israel's Anti-Drug Authority.

The first program, aimed at professionals, will deal with confronting drug abuse in youth.

A program for community workers addresses the link between substance abuse and family violence.

Helman will present "Alternatives," a program for those working with seniors, which addresses ways of handling stress and reducing drug and alcohol dependency.

The programs will be presented in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Waldman Library Opens

VANCOUVER — Noted Israeli author Amos Oz attended the recent opening of the Isaac Waldman Jewish Public Library, located in the enlarged Jewish Community Centre.

The 2,220-sq. ft. library was a gift to the community from Sophie Waldman as a memorial to her late husband.

Waldman said she expects it will be the gathering place for storytelling, lectures by renowned authors, "or for the pleasure of choosing and enjoying a good book. It's a facility where young and old will be able to appreciate their Jewish heritage found in the richness of a library."

U.S. Vote No Danger

VANCOUVER — The Republican sweep in the recent mid-term U.S. elections does not present a danger to Israel, says American Jewish community leader Shoshana Cardin.

Cardin was here recently to speak at a dinner of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. In a CJN interview, she said Sen. Jesse Helms, the next chair of the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee, is unlikely to demand a cut in foreign aid to Israel.

A problem could occur, she said, if Congress moves to restore prayers in American public schools — a measure Jewish groups oppose.

First Pidyon Haben

KELOWNA — The Okanagan Jewish Community recently celebrated its first pidyon haben.

Matthew Faigan was born to new community members Pam and Steve Faigan. Last month, his father handed five silver coins to Abe Cohen as a token of redemption of the first born.

Also added to the community's population is Zoe Plant, born recently to Barb Pullan and Don Plant. Zoe was given the Hebrew name Tziporah at a baby naming here.

ISRAEL

Bomb Kills Soldier

HAIFA — An Israel Defence Force soldier was killed and another moderately wounded in a roadside bomb attack in the northern security zone last Tuesday.

Avi Abuksis, 20, of Dimona was killed.

Hezbollah, in an announcement on its Lebanese radio station, claimed responsibility for the attack.

The organization said its members had planted a large explosive device which they detonated alongside an IDF patrol.

Accident Kills Two

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli soldiers were killed and another critically hurt last week in a training accident at a military base in central Israel.

Capt. Shmuel Ben Gershon, 21 of Jerusalem and Staff Sgt. Moshe Cohen, 24, of Bat Yam were killed in last Tuesday's accident.

An officer who was seriously hurt was hospitalized.

The army is investigating.

Israel Defence Force sources told the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee last week that 17 soldiers were killed in IDF training accidents in 1993.

Ties With Greece

JERUSALEM — Greek Defence Minister Gerasimos Arsenis wrapped up a three-day visit to Israel last week by signing a military cooperation agreement that reflected improved relations between the two countries.

The agreement, signed by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Arsenis, provides for joint military exercises in the Eastern Mediterranean, reciprocal training of officers and a general framework for arms sales.

Arsenis' visit to Israel was the first ever made by a Greek defense minister. In the past, Greece has shown strong support for the PLO.

New HU Degree

JERUSALEM — A master's degree program in international relations, with a focus on diplomacy and foreign policy, was inaugurated recently at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Foreign minister Shimon Peres was a guest at the ceremony.

The program is the first of its kind in Israel.

Stupid Pet Tricks

JERUSALEM — A man came close to being alligator lunch last week after he jumped into the alligator and crocodile compound at the Hamat Gader Hot Springs, south of Tiberias, to settle a bet that the reptiles were not real.

Site manager Ronni Lothan said the visitor took a branch and started beating the tail of a four-metre alligator lying in the grass.

The reptile suddenly turned its head and snapped at the intruder, who jumped back and climbed over a fence, with all body parts intact.

Lothan said the fact that it was winter, when the reptiles' metabolism slows their reactions, probably prevented a more gruesome outcome.

WORLD

Jacob Kaplan Dies

PARIS — Rabbi Jacob Kaplan, who served as France's chief rabbi for 27 years, died here Dec. 6. He was 99.

Born in Paris, Rabbi Kaplan was a soldier in the French Army during World War I. He fought on the front, was wounded and awarded the War Cross.

Kaplan graduated from the Sorbonne a year after the war ended and from the Jewish Seminary of France two years later.

During the Nazi occupation of France, he was a member of the Resistance.

In 1950, he was elected Chief Rabbi of Paris. Five years later, he was chosen Chief Rabbi of France, a post he held until he retired in 1981.

Rubin Appointed

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Bill Clinton last week tapped economic adviser Robert Rubin to replace Lloyd Bentsen as secretary of the treasury, making Rubin the second Jewish member in Clinton's cabinet.

Observers welcomed his appointment and said Rubin has always maintained good ties with the community.

Rubin, who advises Clinton on economic matters, is known for his pro-Israel stand.

Bentsen will step down early next year.

New Charges

BONN — German authorities have brought new charges against Josef Schwammberger, the former Nazi concentration camp commander who is already serving a life sentence for killing 650 Jews during World War II.

The authorities handed down a new indictment last week, charging Schwammberger, 82, with 144 new counts of murder, saying he ordered mass executions of Jews and murdered prisoners himself.

Schwammberger, who commanded several Polish ghettos and labor camps during World War II, was extradited from Argentina to Germany in 1990. He was sentenced to life in prison in May 1992 in the last major Nazi trial in Germany.

Synagogue Restored

AMSTERDAM — Ceremonies were held here recently to mark the completion of restoration of the oldest synagogue in the Netherlands still in use.

The synagogue of Middelburg, in the Dutch province of Zeeland, was built in 1705 and still serves a community of 31 Jews.

Jewish businesses daubed with swastikas in Toronto

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Metro Police are investigating last week's swastika daubings at three Jewish-owned businesses.

Swastikas drawn in red lipstick were found early last Tuesday morning on the windows of Moe Pancer's Delicatessen, Amiron Budget Travel and Bathurst Cleaners and Tailors. The three stores are in a strip mall on Bathurst Street at York Downs Drive, in the heart of Metro's Jewish area.

Three other businesses — a video store, a convenience store and a men's hair stylist — were untouched.

"It's obviously a deliberate attempt to target only Jewish-owned businesses," said Richard Berman of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, who was on the scene.

"This is of great concern to the Jewish community," Berman said.

The swastikas ranged in size from six inches to one foot high. There were no anti-Semitic messages.

Deli owner Stan Pancer erased the two swastikas from his windows as soon as he saw them, to the dismay of police.

'Angry and appalled'

"I'm a third-generation Canadian. I won't tolerate it," he told The CJN. "You can call me anything you want but I won't tolerate that.

"If I catch whoever did this, I'll break their arms. I would take the charge, without question."

Amiron Budget Travel owner Ami Lohr said the incident left him "angry and appalled."

"You feel helpless, that you can't run from your heritage," said Lohr, an eighth-generation Sabra. "I don't want to run from my heritage. I'm proud to be a Jew. It's what I am. There's always a fraction of society that is sick."

Lohr said his wife was particularly shocked by the incident because her father is a survivor of Auschwitz.

Const. Phil Glavin of Metro Police's community services squad asked The CJN to advise Jewish shop- and homeowners who are attacked not to erase offending messages until police are called and investigate.

Police from 32 Division and 3 District Headquarters are also investigating the incident. As of last week, there were no arrests made in the case.

CJC Pacific region bows out of Holocaust programs

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress has announced that beginning this January, it will no longer help plan local Holocaust remembrance and education programs because of tight staffing.

At a Nov. 24 meeting, the board decided it would be more cost effective for another organization to take over planning the annual Holocaust symposium for public high school students, Yom Hashoah events and the Kristallnacht commemorative lecture, co-sponsored by Congregation Beth Israel.

The region has two full-time and one part-time staff which carry out numerous advocacy duties.

Pacific region has traditionally had a standing committee to coordinate Holocaust programming, which the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) has funded for the past two years.

The new Vancouver Holocaust Centre could take over the programming.

The board said its main priorities are community relations with outlying Jewish communities in British Columbia; world Jewish affairs; Israel affairs programs; war criminals; and community information, education and identity initiatives.

Holocaust remembrance and education are identified by national Congress as "local programs," and the responsibility of the regions.

Congress is the "representative body of the national Jewish community of Canada, authorized to act as the community's advocate and spokesperson on matters of regional, national and international concerns." The Pacific region feels it will now have more time to concentrate on these activities.

The board urged the JFGV to continue "memorializ[ing] the tragedy of the Shoah for the current and future generations." It offered to sit on a Holocaust committee and be involved in Holocaust education "in the context of anti-Semitism and anti-racist education and multicultural programming."

The region will also assist in developing Holocaust education policy with the B.C. education ministry and "remain the link and advocate within the community to all levels of government."

Legal experts attend human rights conference

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some of Canada's top legal specialists and judges — including three from the Supreme Court — are in Israel this week for a groundbreaking conference on human rights and the law.

The Canadians are exchanging ideas with their Israeli counterparts on a divisive new topic in the Jewish state: judicial review, or the ability of the Knesset to override a law by invoking what was once uniquely Canadian: a notwithstanding clause.

In fact, Israel's legal system has borrowed more than that from Canada. In 1992, the Knesset enacted two far-reaching laws: the Basic Law on Human Dignity and Freedom and the Basic Law on Freedom of Occupation, both modeled closely on Canada's 1982 Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

But Israel's so-called "mini-charter" of human rights went further: it incorporated the country's declaration of independence. Whereas in Canada, charter judgments are often cast in the light of what is permissible in a free and democratic society, in Israel, judges can override existing laws if they are seen to conflict with the values of a free, democratic and Jewish society.

Irwin Cotler

According to McGill University Prof. Irwin Cotler, the Canadian influence helped lead to this month's controversial ruling by Israel's High Court of Justice that a company must extend the same benefits to homosexual couples as it does to heterosexual ones.

The landmark decision was arrived at by amending one of the basic laws. But religious parties in Israel have pledged to introduce their own bill that would override the ruling, based on a notwithstanding clause.

The legal eagles meet until Dec. 15 to discuss the Nature and Legitimacy of Judicial Review.

The three Supreme Court of Canada judges attending are Peter Cory, Gerard LaForest and Frank Iacobucci. Joining them are Rosalie Abella of the Ontario Court of Appeal; Michel Proulx and Melvin Rothman of Quebec's Court of Appeal; University of Toronto law school dean Robert Sharp; McGill's dean of law, Steven Toope; Bruce Elman, the associate dean of law at the University of Alberta; Lorraine Weinrib, a University of Toronto law professor; and Cotler.

Also participating are two U.S. Supreme Court Justices, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Antonio Scalia, and the chief justice of Germany.

The four-day conference is round two of the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Program (C-ILCP), set up two years ago by the law faculties of McGill, the University of Toronto, University of Alberta and the Hebrew University in Jerusalem to foster exchange of legal and human rights issues between the two countries.

Last month, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Antonio Lamer, visited Israel to hold talks with his Israeli counterpart, Meir Shamgar. However, the visit took on explosive political overtones when Lamer and Shamgar tried to visit sites in eastern Jerusalem, which Canada officially views as occupied territory.

In the end, Lamer visited the Western Wall without notifying anyone.

But his influence was felt in the ruling on homosexual rights. In his opinion, Israel High Court deputy president Aharon Barak specifically referred to Lamer and a groundbreaking Canadian precedent.

Two years ago, three judges of Canada's top court attended the C-ILCP's inaugural conference in Jerusalem. By the end of this year, therefore, all but two of Canada's nine current Supreme Court justices will have been to Israel.

Also this week, the Canadians will hold training sessions for the Israelis on charter matters. And Barak, slated to become the Israeli high court's next chief justice, has said he is considering sending each justice to Canada for one month for closer study of the charter.

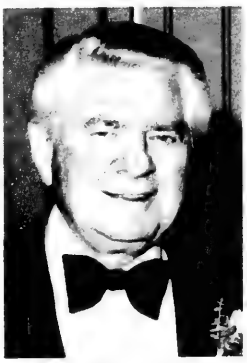
Beilin's plans unrealistic, says UIA leader Cardin

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — There is no enthusiasm in America for Yossi Beilin's plan to do away with the Jewish Agency of Israel and replace it with a "Beit Israel," an international Jewish organization to serve as a liaison between world Jewry and Israel, according to Shoshana Cardin.

Cardin, who is national chair of the United Israel Appeal (UIA) in the United States, told The CJN in an interview that Beilin, the Israeli deputy foreign minister, is unrealistic in advocating the separation of world Jewry from the Jewish Agency, which, she explained, operates in Israel through the financial aid received from the UJA in the United States and Canada, Keren Hayesod and the World Zionist Organization.

Cardin said the relationship between UIA and Israel will remain solid. She said Beilin and the "average Israeli" are obviously not aware of the emotional and psychological ties Jews have with Israel. Israel, she added, is the central component for Jewish continuity, the spiritual and cultural centre of the Jewish world and "the heart of our prayers."



Arthur Fouks

Cardin indicated that the relationship with Israel needs to stop being paternalistic and become one of peer to peer. Israel is a sovereign, independent and strong nation, which is developing economically with great success. But world Jewry still has a role to play.

The Tel Aviv-born Cardin, who was brought up in the United States, was in Vancouver to help launch the Ancie and Arthur Fouks Jewish Continuity Endowment Fund of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) and to honor Arthur Fouks, a pioneer community leader. Close to 200 attended the Fouks tribute dinner.

In her address at the Fouks dinner, Cardin stressed the importance of endowment funds to provide for emergencies and for community planning for the future. "We must leave behind a legacy for our children and grandchildren," she said. "We must endow our obligations, one for the other. We must give back to our people the blessings we have received."

Peter Oreck, president of the JFGV, paid tribute to Fouks, saying, "for 50 years our community has knocked on his door for help and he has always said yes." Oreck announced that the Federation offices will be known as the Arthur Fouks JFGV Centre.

Fouks, who was a co-founder of the Federation here, said leaving a legacy and continuity for the future must be the main goal of the endowment fund. An endowment gift is one that continues indefinitely and supports the stability of the community, he pointed out.

He said there is already well over $6 million in the endowment fund in cash, insurance and other assets.

CJC joins ethnic groups in rejecting PQ commissions

If those conditions are met and other federalist groups indicate they will also appear, B'nai Brith might take part, he said.

"[But] if the scope of the consultation process is clearly to limit groups from expressing their dissident point of view, then B'nai Brith, like other groups, will obviously not participate."

Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region (CJC-Q) and the Italian and Greek communities issued a joint statement on Dec. 8 saying they would not participate in the commissions.

CJC-Q chair Manuel Schacter described the draft sovereignty bill as being "fraught with ambiguity."

"Both the substance of the draft law . . . and the process do not lend themselves to a thoughtful reflection on such a crucial subject for all Quebecers," the coalition statement said.

Among those critical of B'nai Brith's original statement was D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, a member of B'nai Brith's Maple Leaf Lodge.

He told The CJN he was disappointed by B'nai Brith's stated intention to present a brief to the Montreal region commission.

The controversy also raised concern that the Jewish community, with two organizations voicing opposing views on taking part, would not be presenting a common front on the commissions process.

CJC-Q director Jack Jedwab, however, said earlier in the week he did not believe the Jewish community was divided.

"Our position [on not appearing] reflects the majority position," he told The CJN.

"It is not our duty or responsibility to participate in something which aims to further the agenda of the government."

BJC rethinks tennis plans

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) is reconsidering an arrangement in which it would receive a $230,000 infrastructure grant to repair and upgrade the tennis courts at the North York facility.

"We have serious concerns about the arrangements" entered into by the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the BJC's predecessor, said spokesman Howard English.

Under terms of that arrangement, the federal, provincial and municipal governments were to contribute equally to the upgrade. North York would operate the courts under a 20-year lease and make them available to city residents.

"If we accept the arrangement, it means our members will have to compete with non-members for tennis court," English said.

In addition, the BJC fears that public courts would lead to parking problems.

The BJC is now considering its own tennis program, English said, and upgrading the courts as part of its capital improvement program once re-organization plans go forward.

The funds for the program are to come primarily from a $2.5-million line of credit arranged by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

In the meantime, "we're going to ask North York to postpone the arrangement," English said.

North York councillor Michael Feldman, who was instrumental in securing the grant, said "I can't give them assurances that [the money] will be available then."

In a letter to the BJC, Tibor Martinek, chair of the tennis committee of the North Bathurst Tennis Club, states that 98 per cent of the club's 200 members are BJC or ex-JCC members.

He urges the BJC board to accept the grant, saying "it will be totally irresponsible for the present board to derail this once in a lifetime opportunity. . . The community would prefer that you would rather reduce the [JCC's indebtedness] or reduce the membership fees."

Probation ordered for kissing offence

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A 35-year-old Toronto man has pleaded guilty to one count of sexual assault in Ontario court, Criminal Division, over an incident which occurred in May near the Viewmount branch of Eitz Chaim Day School (CJN, June 9).

Michael Abergel appeared in court on November 30. He received a suspended sentence and two years of probation for kissing a student on the head. No violence was involved in the incident.

Conditions of his probation include his residing with his parents, taking treatment for schizophrenia, refraining from communicating with the victim, staying away from females under age 16 unless accompanied by a parent, and not venturing within 100 metres of any school having female students under 16 (with the exception of Eitz Chaim's Viewmount branch and Bialik Hebrew Day School, which are close to his home and on whose grounds he is not to be found).

Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, the school's general studies principal, was unaware of the trial when contacted by The CJN last week. "I'm quite surprised that the matter's still alive," he said.

Humberside attack said preventable

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recent attack against a teacher at Humberside Collegiate Institute did not come out of the blue, but could have been prevented if early warning signs had been heeded, say spokesmen for Jewish anti-racist organizations.

Five years ago, the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada warned the Anti-Racist Multicultural Education Network of Ontario that white supremacists were targeting school children for recruitment and that steps should be taken to nip the problem at the bud.

Similarly, the Toronto Board of Education's race relations committee was told four years ago that white supremacist organizations had changed their image, updated their look and were targeting young people as potential recruits, said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Neither education organization seems to have taken the warnings to heart, the anti-racist spokesmen said.

"I really don't think they saw this as a real potential problem. . . until it hit them in the face," Farber said.

Humberside teacher Mahendra Gupta was knocked unconscious after being pushed down a flight of stairs by a youth and an adult. The attack was apparently part of a white supremacist campaign to "rid" the school of non-white teachers.

Speaking to a meeting of the Toronto board's race relations committee last week, Farber pointed to a dramatic shift in the average age of those attending white supremacist rallies. Ten years ago, the average age was between 65 and 70. Today, it's between 16 and 20, he said.

Racist recruiters are average-looking individuals who "candy coat" their message to make it more palatable to young people, Farber said.

Educators must prepare young people by "giving them the proper tools to fend off white supremacist recruitment.

"If schools neglect to give students the ability to deal with hatemongers, skilful hatemongers will poison their way into the school environment with the potential result of violence," Farber added.

In a telephone interview, Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said few members of the anti-racism network took up the league's offer five years ago to provide anti-racist education. Now the chickens are coming home to roost, she said.

A concerted plan involving anti-racist education might have provided racist recruiters a less fertile soil in which to work, she said.

It appears that school officials were surprised that events escalated to violence, but the signs at Humberside have been there for years, she said.

A swastika was carved into a door, while a student came to school wearing a leather jacket with a line through a Star of David, under which was written "kill," and threatening letters had been circulated.

The steps taken by the Toronto Board of Education to ban white and red shoelaces — which symbolize white power and fascism, respectively — is at best a "Band-Aid solution," said the League's Richard Berman. "That's treating the symptom of a symptom."

What is missing is a concerted, coordinated anti-racism program that includes educating teachers, principals and administrators, as well as sensitizing students to racist recruitment techniques.

Rick Kollins, secondary schools superintendant for the Toronto Board of Education, said that while the board does not have programs designed to assist students resist racist recruiters, "embedded in our curriculum are the issues of tolerance and understanding."

Kollins said that even before the Humberside attack, the board had planned a mandatory training program for school administrators on the issue of hate crimes. In light of current events, that is being expanded to include student and parent representation.

Hadassah Hospital starts bone marrow registry

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem is launching a bone marrow registry to help those needing bone marrow transplants to find a match.

Judy Mandleman, national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, said the organization will undertake fundraising to help the project as part of its work with Hadassah International.

The decision to fund the registry was made at a recent national executive meeting in Toronto, attended by 120 women from all over Canada.

Two members from Hadassah U.S. led workshops on the packaging and marketing of campaigns.

One of the U.S. members reported that Hadassah Hospital now has a computerized system called Scandiplan, which helps doctors pinpoint body areas for radiation treatment. It is the only such system in the Middle East and is financed by Hadassah International, which comprises Hadassah organizations in about 35 countries.

Judy Mandleman

Mandleman said the Women to Women project to help battered women in Israel was launched successfully across the country in October and to date 200 members have enrolled in the program at a minimum cost of $180 each. Members who sign up get special pins, indicating their support of the program. The campaign continues.

The executive meeting heard reports from a number of centres that held their annual bazaars and "they have been as successful as usual." Several cities are planning to continue the Chocolate Sunday campaign to be held during the next couple of months.

Victoria will open its Chocolate Sunday in January with a kosher dinner the night before, using the new facilities of the Empress Hotel. Chocolate Sunday is held in the adjoining Victoria Conference Centre.

Youth aliyah campaign

The Youth Aliyah campaign in the coming year will provide funding to bring 300 top students, aged 15 to 17, from former Soviet countries to study in Israel for three years. The program is being run in co-operation with the Jewish Agency and the Israel government.

Students will have the choice of making aliyah when they are 17. If they go back home "they will go as Jews . . . These kids are our future," said Mandleman. Students will be housed at Hadassah-WIZO villages and schools.

It was announced at the executive meeting that Hadassah International will hold its ninth annual congress in Montreal in the spring.

To encourage "prime time" Canadian members in the 45-60 age group to carry on with Hadassah activities and to promote Jewish continuity, a strategic task force has been set up under the chairmanship of Naomi Frankenburg of Vancouver, a past national president, to develop new programs and projects and to participate in leadership training.

Bristow, Droege urged harassment of Jews: Christie

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Lawyer Doug Christie has revealed that neo-Nazi Heritage Front founders Grant Bristow and Wolfgang Droege unsuccessfully tried to sell him on the idea of an anti-Jewish harassment campaign.

Bristow is alleged to have set up Heritage Front while working as a paid informer for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). An official report is due shortly from the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

In other media reports, the contents of which Christie confirmed in a CJN phone interview, Bristow and Droege met with Christie at a local restaurant and offered him a list of names, addresses and phone numbers of prominent North American Jews. They wanted Christie to begin harassing these people and even suggested the harassment might extend to violence.

The meeting took place in 1990. Christie said he spurned the offer and hasn't seen Bristow since.

"With me, that wouldn't work, but I don't know how many other people it has been used against," Christie told the Times-Colonist newspaper.

He said he didn't go to the police because after he told Bristow and Droege what they were proposing was illegal, they seemed to agree. He called Bristow a "loose-nut case."

Bristow disappeared in August after allegations about his racist activities while supposedly a CSIS agent were widely reported in the Canadian media. Droege was a candidate for city council in the recent Scarborough civic elections.

Christie confirmed for The CJN that he first met Bristow in 1989 when Christie was defending Imre Finta against war crimes charges in Toronto. Bristow offered to work as Christie's bodyguard, pumped him about his line of defence and told him one member of the jury pool was expressing anti-Finta statements.

Christie wonders if he was a CSIS surveillance target. He said he has never engaged in anything subversive. "I have done everything I have done publicly and I don't feel there should be spies used against me."

He told The CJN he sees no need for a Canadian spy service now that the Cold War is over, and doesn't like the idea of a Canadian spy agency spying on Canadians.

Christie said he went public about the Bristow-Droege meeting to explain the situation before the SIRC report was released.

Ottawa is erring in dealings with PQ, says former PM aid

TORONTO — Brian Mulroney's former chief of staff believes Ottawa is making mistakes in dealing with Quebec separatist Premier Jaques Parizeau.

"The federal government is acting as if it is not aware we have a problem," said Stanley Hartt, speaking to members of UJA's Young Construction Network.

Hartt cited the squabble between Quebec and Ottawa over federal compensation for Quebec's participation in the Charlottetown constitutional referendum. The new Quebec government demanded payment almost immediately after assuming office. Ottawa took two days to respond positively.

"The promise was made to three provinces," Hartt said. "The two days ... are two days in which it was seared into the minds of Quebecers that they were being cheated."

Hartt said Prime Minister Jean Chretien was wrong for not permitting Quebec's deputy premier Bernard Landry to replace Parizeau on the recent Team Canada trip to China. Parizeau claimed the pressures of getting ready to govern prevented him from joining the delegation.

"His excuse was perfectly reasonable," claimed Hartt.

"Parizeau's strategy seems to be to put Ottawa in a position where they make Quebec feel unwanted," he said.

Hartt called Parizeau's intention of passing a law declaring Quebec's sovereignty and then asking Quebecers to endorse it an attempt to convince them nothing will change.

However, Hartt's UJA adress wasn't just criticism. He offered Chretien what he called a solution "lying right under his fingernails."

Ottawa is currently conducting a policy review of all federal and provincial programs for wasteful duplication. According to Hartt, the federal government could offer the provinces jurisdiction in new areas, or leave them in Ottawa's hands, based on the findings.

"This new amount of sovereignty should be available to any province that wants to make a deal," Hartt said.

Hartt's appearance at the UJA event was arranged by Gord Wiseman, who co-chairs the Young Construction Network with Neil Warshafsky.

Parizeau's ploy

Like the sunrise each morning, or the exhilaration at seeing seasons change, there are certain phenomena which we rely on as important truths. A Canada which includes Quebec is one of them.

Yet, in the Legislative Assembly last week, Quebec Premier Jacques Parizeau took the first significant step to separate Canadians from that truth. He tabled the draft of a bill which will form the basis of a referendum, the very first section of which states: "Quebec is a sovereign country." Thus, with these five bold and biting words, Mr. Parizeau has shrewdly attempted to have Quebecers adopt as foregone, a proposition which is not yet a conclusion.

The bill contains a number of other provisions which purport to give economic, constitutional, territorial and judicial meaning to the definition of independence. That this definition includes numerous linkages with a carved-out Canada is a presumption which the PQ evidently feel will naturally follow. Canadians, though, may have something else to say about the presumption.

In addition, the Quebec premier has combined the draft bill with a public consultation process whose purpose is to provide advice on the "declaration of sovereignty" that will ultimately find its way into the preamble of the legislation. Mr. Parizeau is establishing a network of 15 regional committees which, as Jeffrey Simpson of the Globe and Mail wrote, will be "dominated by secessionist politicians from the National Assembly and the Commons . . . The commissions will take themselves into every corner of the province, promoting, explaining, reassuring." Hearings begin in February.

The starting point of Mr. Parizeau's consultation is Quebec independence. It bypasses not only the very question which has been at the heart of the separation debate but also the voices and aspirations of the large number of Quebecers who do not side with the separatists. In choosing these tactics, Mr. Parizeau is abridging, if not evading, a true democratic process. Prime Minister Jean Chretien called the process "an attempt to dupe Quebecers." We agree with him.

It is no wonder then that the federalist forces in the province, including a Montreal-based coalition of the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Italo-Canadian National Congress and the Hellenic Congress of Quebec, are boycotting the premier's consultation ploy. To participate in the process would be to give it credibility and to reinforce the sense of inevitability about Quebec sovereignty which Mr. Parizeau is so carefully cultivating. It would mean acquiescing in an outcome which has been rigged from the start.

But boycotting the government's consultation requires federalist forces to quickly mobilize with a countervailing strategy of their own. The field of political battle must not be left to the separatists.

By tabling the sovereignty bill, Mr. Parizeau has raised the curtain on the next, if not final, act of the drama. Federalists cannot now stand in the wings. For Canadians, a Canada which includes Quebec is too vital a truth.

Fundamentalist threat

Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres was undoubtedly right when he identified Islamic fundamentalism as the major threat to Mideast peace today.

The depth of the hatred which animates the anti-Israel rhetoric and actions of Hamas was revealed in all its ugliness in a recent PBS program, in which Robert Fisk, a British journalist noted for his critical approach to Israel, interviews Hamas spokesmen.

Fisk asks his interviewee whether hatred of Israel is based on political, national or ethnic considerations. The Islamic fundamentalist replies that none of those considerations are relevant. "It is a religious struggle — Muslims against Jews, the Koran against the Torah!"

Fisk's interlocutor represents a tiny but growing constituency within the Muslim world today which is attempting to transform a purely political conflict into a religious crusade. It is unfortunate indeed that these fringe elements want to change one of the world's great faiths into an engine of anti-Semitism.

Israel is now bearing the brunt of this religious fanaticism but, as history teaches, it begins with Jews but eventually it engulfs all.

Fundamentalist attacks in Egypt, Algeria and other Arab lands which have targeted tourists, government officials, writers and journalists have alerted the world to the danger posed by the threat of Hamas-type organizations.

It is understandable in these circumstances for Israel to adopt rigid security controls to try to contain Hamas. As Abba Eban pointed out years ago: "Israel is under no international obligation to commit national suicide."

ITALIAN JEWS

Re your article "Assimilation helped Italian Jews survive" (CJN, Dec. 1).

It is obvious that everybody hears different messages from a most inspiring evening but the main message was definitely not the one in your headline.

It was an evening of two communities getting together and remembering the Holocaust and learning that people can make the difference in spite of their government's laws and decrees.

I have to agree that it is well known in Holocaust studies, that Jews in any country of Europe who spoke the language of the people around them, or looked like them, had a better chance to go in hiding — which was the case in Italy. Foremost, they had to have friends they could trust to turn to, either to help them personally or to connect them with the right people, in most cases the resistance.

Professor Susan Zucotti mentioned that in Italy all Jews, regardless of their nationality, were saved. This was endorsed during the Q & A period when two ladies from the former Yugoslavia got up and told in a most moving testimony, their stories of rescue in Italy with their families by Italian peasants, total strangers to them.

This program was co-sponsored by the Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery, Columbus Centre and the National Congress of Italian Canadians, Toronto district.

We always mention that we stood alone during the Shoah; why not mention that there were exceptions in a few countries and people who did not stand by and do nothing? It can teach us all, and in particular our youth, that after all, people can make the difference.

MONTREALER NEW VP

Re the article on the Reconstructionist annual convention, held recently in Dana Point, California (CJN, Nov. 24). I want to point out several errors/omissions. In the first place, I live in Montreal, not Toronto (or at least a suburb thereof) and have been a member of Congregation Dorshei Emet for almost 20 years.

Secondly, the two members of the Ottawa Havura who attended are Teena and Walter Henoelman, and the havura has about 100 people (not families).

With respect to my nomination as vice president, Canadian region, I replace Phyllis Angel Greenberg, of Toronto, who held the position with great distinction for two terms.

Finally, Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan wrote that "the past has a vote but not a veto," not Torah, as stated.

JEWISH IDENTITY

Jewish Continuity is the talk of the town. At a recent Montreal Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) event, Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Prof. Frederick Krantz spoke about Jewish continuity, the problems of intermarriage and assimilation, and keeping young Jews involved. I am a university student and was the youngest person there by at least 20 years. That night, after once again listening to a Jew of an older generation speak about how to inspire Jews of my generation, I knew I had to speak up.

As a young North American Jew, my Jewish experiences differ greatly from those of my grandparents and even parents. I was not alive during the Holocaust. I did not experience pogroms, nor was I expelled from my country. I have not suffered anti-Semitism and I am allowed by law to practise my religion. But the Jewish community around me is an older one that is united by its past experiences and common suffering. At least 10 times more Jews attended the memorial service for Nachshon Waxman than came to the meeting on the future of the WZO.

The new generation of Jews cannot thrive on victimization and self-pity. It is the age of pride. Displayed on campus are posters affirming gay-pride and black-pride, the Jewish-pride posters are nowhere to be found but are replaced with advertisements for a "Why the Jews?" lecture. Is this the way to maintain Jewish continuity? Who wants to be part of a culture that only suffers?

Yossi Beilin is headed in the right direction with his proposal to ensure every Jewish 17-year-old in the Diaspora a trip to Israel.

Once we decide to change the Jewish identity to a positive one, we must ensure that this trend continues in all frameworks of Jewish education. Day schools and afternoon and Hebrew schools must educate about the many significant accomplishments Jews have made throughout history. We must teach not only about tragic events but about the Emancipation and the Enlightenment and The Golden Age of Spain. When learning about the Holocaust, Jewish children should be as familiar with the name Mordechai Anielwicz as they are with Anne Frank. Ben Gurion and Brandeis should be household names.

DELISLE CREATES NEW FUROR

Quebec and French Nazis

By SHELI TEITELBAUM
Special to The CJN

Esther Delisle, the Quebec historian who stirred up a furor with a study exposing the anti-Semitism in 1930s French Canadian nationalism, is about to do it again.

This time, she has documented how key French Canadian politicians and public personalities smoothed the way for French Nazi war criminals and Nazi sympathizers to escape into Canada after World War II, and protected them once they got there.

In new research which she plans to turn into a book, the 40-year-old Delisle, a postdoctoral fellow at McGill University, says she has uncovered disturbing similarities between the postwar Canadian Embassy in Paris and the infamous "Rat Line," which spirited Nazis using false papers to new lives outside devastated Europe.

One of the ex-Nazis smuggled into Quebec was known as the Count de Bernonville (it later turned out that the title was phony). Jacques Dugé de Bernonville's wartime record included a stint as the Vichy French official responsible for "Jewish affairs" in Morocco, and later in occupied France, where he was a close associate of Klaus Barbie, the German "Butcher of Lyons."

In Quebec, De Bernonville was joined by Georges Simenon, the Belgian writer and Nazi sympathizer, and about eight other wartime collaborators. The dashing and handsome De Bernonville was the darling of the French-Canadian intellectual elite, with its strong fascist sympathies. He remained in the province until the early 1950s, when the Canadian government expelled him; he was murdered in Brazil in 1951.

What has been called L'Affaire De Bernonville was no secret at the time. Indeed, his presence in the province was staunchly defended by French-Canadian newspapers, some of which observed that if he had been De Bernovitch, a Jewish Communist, no one would have said a word about his being there.

But Delisle's research takes the story a step further. She has discovered how De Bernonville and his associates came under the protection of prominent and very respectable Quebec citizens, including Louis St. Laurent, later to become prime minister; Maurice Duplessis, at the time Quebec's premier; the former rector of Quebec's Laval University; and the late mayor of Montreal.

Before De Bernonville was expelled, St. Laurent told him that his hubris had led to deportation. "Damned fool," St. Laurent wrote in a letter. "If you had kept your mouth shut you could have stayed."

Delisle says she also has evidence connecting the Canadian Embassy in Paris — which before the war was told by immigration officials to regard the prospect of even one Jewish refugee arriving in Canada as "too many" — with the escape operation.

"It seems that there was a lot of blackmail going on. Everyone was blackmailing everyone else," Delisle told the Jerusalem Report in a telephone conversation. Quebec historian Robert Rumilly, who served as the front man for the French collaborators, helped them avoid deportation, says Delisle. "He acknowledged in many letters that he was using money to bribe politicians, and collecting information to threaten them."

Delisle's findings, some of which are based on previously classified material archived in Washington, concern "more than just the people immediately involved," she says. "These fierce Quebec nationalists had connections with well-known French fascists and extreme nationalists after the war, which leads me to suspect that they had these links before the war."

Esther Delisle

The real issue, she says, is not just about how the characters, most of whom are now dead, behaved almost half a century ago. "This is really about French Canadians, about how we view our national past."

Delisle's penchant for ruffling feathers has led some students and teachers to label her "a traitor to Quebec." Says Delisle: "I've been told the problem is not that what I say is not true. The problem is that I am prepared to document, perhaps leading others outside of Quebec to think ill of us."

'In France you can now talk about Mitterrand's close associations with an extreme nationalist group during the war'

Montreal Jewish author Mordecai Richler used some of Delisle's earlier research to support the thesis of once-endemic Quebec anti-Semitism he advanced in magazine articles and in his 1992 book Oh Canada, Oh Quebec — Requiem for a Divided Country. Delisle maintains that for the Quebecois, Richler's cardinal sin "wasn't what he said — it was that he published the scathing articles in the New Yorker.

"In France," she says, "you can now talk freely about Francois Mitterrand's close associations with an extreme nationalist group during the war. But in Quebec, although these people are by and large all dead, there is still great difficulty in coming to terms with what happened then."

Delisle refers to the way francophone Canada reacted to her 1993 bestseller The Traitor and the Jew, a study of anti-Semitism and extreme French Canadian nationalism in 1929-39. Reviled by her Quebecois associates for having been "bought by the Jews," she says she was blacklisted by some Quebec universities and research institutions.

In 1987, as a doctoral candidate at Laval University, Delisle, who is not Jewish, returned from three years' work at Hebrew University in Jerusalem for a hearing on her dissertation, on the pre-World War II anti-Semitism and pro-fascism found in the writings of revered Quebec historian and cleric Abbé Lionel Groulx. Critics charged that Delisle's thesis was extreme and "lacking in context," and that the anti-Semitism was "marginal" to Groulx's vast output.

Her doctoral work was placed on a burner for two years; the normal waiting period at Laval is three to six months. The hearing where it was approved in a 3-2 committee vote, she says, was like "a Gothic scene from the Middle Ages. A friend of mine in the audience told me, 'We had the impression that if you didn't pass, they would burn you.' "

Delisle maintains that the anti-Semitism of Groulx (1878-1967) was there for all to see in his 1930s writings, but was "deliberately swept under the carpet."

The Quebec-born daughter of a federal government clerk, Delisle says she has no Jewish ancestors. Her first name (her mother just found "Esther" exotic) has figured in the controversies that have swirled around her. University professors and other members of the francophone elite invariably ask about her Jewish connection. "It's the only way," she says, "that the francophone kings of my tribe can fathom my treachery."

Delisle was drawn to the subject of French-Canadian nationalism while teaching a course on Quebecois political ideas at a local community college in the early 1980s; initially she sought new ways to look at Groulx to entice her students. And she was intrigued by the fact that the recognized histories of Quebec said nothing about Groulx's anti-Semitism.

Indeed, during his early years, Groulx had little influence, and his own people did not accept his proposed Achat Chez Nous [Buy at Home] boycott of Jewish shop owners. Only in the 1960s, when French-Canadian nationalism was in need of national heroes, was he afforded wider recognition.

Delisle's work on Groulx earned her more than one epithet. She was dubbed Quebec's Nasty Girl, after Anna Rosmus, the real-life heroine of a 1990 German film who researched the wartime record of her Bavarian hometown. Others charged she had been "bought by the Jews, if she isn't Jewish herself."

Delisle's publisher, Robert Davies, says that some bookstores stocked only one copy of her first book, to protect themselves from charges of silent censorship. An official at one shopping mall cut off the power to another bookstore, when it did not heed his warnings to stop offering The Traitor and the Jew for sale.

But someone out there is interested. Traitor stayed on the Montreal Gazette's list of bestsellers for 21 weeks. Delisle's new book on the French-Canadian connection with co-author John Hellman, a noted American scholar of French, also at McGill, is likely to match that both in sales and controversy.

What's the question?

By CARL ALPERT

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has promised more than once that he will call for a public referendum on the question of Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

What is not clear is whether such a poll will take place before any commitments are made to Syria, or after Rabin and Hafez al-Assad have hammered out an agreement.

There are many in Israel who believe a matter as critical as this should not be determined by a simple majority. They think a two-thirds or even a three-quarter majority should be required. This is especially true, they argue, considering that 18 per cent of the population are Arabs who, it may be presumed, would vote in favor of abandoning the Golan, thus slanting the vote heavily even before the ballots are counted.

Finally, there is the problem of how the question on the ballot will be worded. There is no provision in Israel's law for the conduct of such a public poll, and presumably the Knesset will enact the necessary legislation and phrase the question. In such case, since Rabin has only a very narrow margin of support in the Knesset, would a 51-49 per cent be sufficient to determine how the question should be phrased?

I can think of at least 10 different forms the query could take. Here are some that come to mind:

1. Should Israel return the Golan in return for peace? That is the simplest form, but it spells out no details.

2. With regard to the Golan, do you believe that peace is more important than territory?

3. Do you have faith in the integrity of the Syrian president if he promises not to attack after we withdraw from the Golan?

4. Should the selfish interests of a few thousand Jews who live on the Golan take precedence over the desire of the rest of Israel for peace?

5. Do you favor putting Israel's population in the north at risk by letting the Syrians occupy the Golan Heights, in return for a piece of paper?

6. Should Israel withdraw from the Golan Heights in return for normalization of relations with Syria, including full diplomatic exchange and a mutual pledge of non-aggression?

7. Should Israel withdraw from the Golan and place its trust in an international force stationed there to prevent aggression — assuming that Assad were to permit such a neutral force?

8. Are you willing for Israel to remain on the Golan, and thus assure a permanent state of war with Syria?

9. Should Israel withdraw from the Golan and place its trust in the president of Syria, or whoever else may succeed him, not to use the territory for attacks against Israel?

10. Do you believe Israel should take the risk, and give peace a chance by withdrawing from the Golan and accepting Assad's pledge of non-aggression?

The reader can undoubtedly add many other variations. The principle is that the question should be simple and direct, and unobscured by many paragraphs and explanations.

Can there ever be substantial agreement in favor of an acceptable text? One suggestion has been that all possible forms of the question should be listed on a ballot, and a referendum of the public then held to ascertain which question is most acceptable.

Letting go - a senior's confession

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Philip Roth's Letting Go appeared three decades ago. My contribution to his underlying theme will be considerably shorter and probably less memorable. It will also be distinctly autobiographical.

Dad, who had come from utterly modest circumstances in a little village, had been largely self-educated and had developed into an avid reader and buyer of books. By the time I was old enough to appreciate the extent of our library, I had caught the bug — and for many decades thereafter, buying and possessing books became important for me.

In earlier years I did not have the means to satisfy this desire, but as circumstances improved I became a follower of book sales, subscribed to auction catalogues and the like — always feeling that obtaining a particular volume I wanted for my library was something necessary.

As I grew older, I began to realize that it was not so much reading the book as having it that became important; and once I had come to that realization, the urge began to flatten out, decrease and finally leave me altogether.

I marvel how the need to acquire things in general is so strong when we are young or middle-aged, and begins to wane and even disappear as we get older. Acquiring things loses its attraction, and the pleasure of giving them away takes its place.

It's a strange reversal. The book which I remember I wanted so badly to add to my library and finally found in an Oxford shop, is now given away without a second thought. And so it goes with just about everything else that leaves the house. Happiness these days consists of knowing that what we give away has found the right place, where people can enjoy it and the recipients have the benefit of its value.

Whatever little wisdom one gains when getting older, one thing is sure: it makes the opening words of Koheleth more understandable: "Everything is like a puff of air, like a breath one takes" (formerly this was rendered as "vanity of vanities, all is vanity, says the Preacher").

Thus, aging brings about a recognition of something we should have known all along: things are tools that do fill a physical need to increase our comfort and give pleasure — but tools nonetheless and nothing more. What remains are the essentials of life: love, relationships and health. Once the basic requirements of personal comfort are in place, the physical gives way to the relational. Perhaps this is also one reason why people as they age rediscover the joy of reading, listening, learning and praying.

East European anti-Semitism makes comeback

By BARUCH COHEN
Special to The CJN

Eastern Europe is experiencing a "return to history." The myths of nationalism and the revival of "old" ideologies, movements and leaders with a fascist, anti-Semitic past are key factors in the present-day political arena.

The denial of the Holocaust, the whitewashing of the dark years 1937-1945, are indicative of the intensity with which a watering down of historical memory is being promoted. Internal socio-economic fragility has ensured a rise in the level of suspicion and hatred of minorities.

The Hungarian Justice and Life Party and the Greater Romania Party (GRP), for example, both represent "recognized," institutional anti-Semitic movements, functioning, not as marginal groups, but rather within the framework of the current political structure. Their aim is to combat "Jewish influence," to expose the "Jewish problem" to the public at large.

Anti-Semitic incidents involving violence or the threat of violence have not abated (e.g. attacks against a person who "looked Jewish" in Budapest and against the Rabbi of Bratislava, insults hurled at Jewish youth groups participating in the March of the Living in Poland).

In Hungary, The Hungarian Justice and Life Party's main thrust is against the "formidable" influence of Jews in Hungarian politics. Kiraly Izbella, a maverick politician and member of the party, is known not only for her anti-Semitic and nationalist speeches, but also for her defense of skinheads, whom she has referred to as "nice Hungarian boys."

In Romania, the GRP constitutes a powerful and active anti-Semitic political force. Its leader, Corneliu Vadim Tudor, has targeted the Jewish community (along with its leader, the late Chief Rabbi Moses Rosen), as well as journalists and historians who have presumed to criticize the rising wave of Romanian nationalism and the rehabilitation of the Conducatorul, Ion Antonescu, Romania's wartime Fuhrer. It seems that the party acts with impunity in coalition with other extreme nationalist-fascist forces in their efforts to rehabilitate Antonescu.

Romania Mare and Politica are two press organs of the GRP, as is the weekly Europa, best known of the anti-Semitic publications. The state-run Romanian TV network was headed until December 1993 by Paul Everac, a staunch anti-Semite. Under his direction, Romanian TV was a source of overt anti-Semitic accusations.

The revisionism of the past and Holocaust denial are seen all through Europe. The "return to history" (a term used by Prof. Bela Vago in his article, Anti-Semitism in Eastern Europe in Anti-Semitism World Wide: Tel-Aviv University, 1994) is gathering in intensity. The manifestations of anti-Semitism reflect the way the legacy of the not-so-distant past still makes itself felt in some Eastern European countries, and especially in Romania.

The idea that Antonescu was a great patriot, who allied his country with Nazi Germany against the Communist Soviet Union for the sake of the purest national ideals, is growing in popularity among Romanians. There is also a belief, widely-held across the political spectrum — from moderate to right-wing groups — that Antonescu saved a segment of Romanian Jewry during the Holocaust. This belief disregards or minimizes the responsibility of the Romanian authorities for the extermination of a significant number of Jews (half of Romania's 850,000 Jews perished during the Holocaust years).

At a time when Holocaust denial and historical revisionism seem to be spreading, the rehabilitation of Antonescu has wider implications. It will certainly have an influence in shaping the knowledge and understanding of the Holocaust in future generations and will also give greater room for manoeuvre to local fascist leaders. This trend of selective historical memory is in vogue and has intensified in Hungary, Slovakia and Croatia. The Journal of Historical Review, the major revisionist publication, praised Croat President Franjo Tudjman's notions of the Holocaust, stating, "While a Few European countries have outlawed Holocaust revisionism, in Croatia it enjoys support from the highest level."

In Poland, the revival of the past has centred around the 50th anniversary of the founding of the National Armed Forces (NSZ), a nationalist, anti-Semitic underground organization that operated in Poland during and immediately following World War II. The participation of the country's officials in the celebration of this event was another example of how the nationalist past is used to serve political interests.

Jewish communities in Eastern Europe are struggling against this rising tide of anti-Semitism. In Slovakia, the Jewish community is anxious about the safety of the country's Jews. In Romania, Chief Rabbi Rosen conducted a relentless campaign against anti-Semitism, warning Romania's political leadership and sensitizing the entire world, to the dangers involved in the revival of Iron Guard fascism in the country.

The continuing proliferation of extremist movements and the free flow of Holocaust denial and hate literature should serve as warning signs that the struggle against anti-Semitism is a complex one which requires not only strong statements of repudiation by current political leaders, but also urgent and concrete action.

Daughter's bat mitzvah looms on the horizon

It looms on the horizon.

It begins to look larger than a seder for 40 people, more daunting than moving day, more expensive than redecorating the house, possessed of more pitfalls than crossing Niagara on a tightrope. It is the mother of all motherhood challenges, the most dangerous moment of my parental career thus far.

The bat mitzvah is coming!

Our eldest daughter has her 12th birthday in April, and the planning has already begun. Every conversation turns inexorably to the core religious question at the heart of this experience: seated dinner or brunch buffet, Saturday night or Sunday noon?

I am trying, as you may have gathered, to maintain a sense of humor about this, and we are all trying to maintain a sense of spirituality. Because we are in an Orthodox congregation, my daughter will not read the portion or the Haftorah, and she will not speak during services. However, my husband will speak (elevating him slightly beyond the status of father-of-the-bride) and my daughter, following the pattern set by her peers at our shul, may speak at the kiddush following services. She may or may not also speak at the party we will hold in her honor, a party that already presents immense buckets of fretfulness to all involved — except the guest of honor who is worried primarily about not being deathly embarrassed by her parents.

By Erica Meyer Ranzin

We have made a couple of decisions that are designed to keep the bat mitzvah in perspective and to maintain our family's fiscal stability for another month or two.

The primary decision is that our daughter can have a lovely party for her young friends, but we — the adults involved — aren't going to invite anybody to come ... NO ONE ... not the next door neighbors we love; not the carpool ladies we depend upon, not the teachers; not the butchers, bakers or candlestick makers.

Okay, so the caterer and the photographer can come. But that's it. All right, all right, so the family can come . . . but no other grown-ups, not one. If you've hit puberty, forget it.

We'll have the congregation and the 'hood to the kiddush and service. We'll feed the out-of-towners (stay home! stay home!) Friday night. We'll be just as gracious as two shell-shocked people can be, but the party is for pubescents and blood kin. Why? Because if we invite one friend, we'll have to invite 100. It's the price you pay for being in a close-knit community.

It is also put-up-or-shut-up time for us, after years of philosophizing that bar and bat mitzvahs should be serious rites of religious passage, not get-down, hoe-downs of conspicuous consumption.

It is easy to believe that, but tough (except budgetarily) to stick to it when the golden child in the spotlight is one's own golden child, and not somebody else's. This is the first baby, the child who always smiles and loves to please, the child who saved another young swimmer's life when she was nine, the child who transformed us from a couple to a family, the big sister, the artist, the child who wears her Jewishness easily, a lifelong garment. What does she deserve? The world and more, of course. What is best for her? A sweet celebration, a meaningful transition, not a circus.

We want this event to knit her more closely to Judaism, not to catered dinners. We want the impact to last. We hope being bat mitzvahed will start her adult life in the community — not culminating her Jewish education, but launching it.

After all, you may have heard the joke about the congregation that couldn't get rid of the bats in the ceiling of the sanctuary. The president of the congregation tried virulent poisons. No luck. The executive director captured the bats, drove 50 miles out of town and released them, only to find that they beat him back to the shul. At last, the board asked the rabbi to help get rid of the critters. A week later, no more bats.

The president of the shul went to the rabbi and said, "It's wonderful. The bats are all gone from the synagogue. What did you do?"

"It was easy," said the rabbi. "I bar mitzvahed them, and I haven't seen them since."

Poland's new Jewish community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

There has been a dramatic improvement in the quality of Jewish communal life in Poland in the past five years, according to a Warsaw-based Jewish activist.

And, Konstanty Gebert adds, there is even a "real chance" that a "renaissance" may revitalize the heretofore anemic Jewish community.

Before World War II, Poland contained upwards of 3.5 million Jews. The Nazi Holocaust and communism all but ended this fecund chapter in the annals of the Diaspora.

But since the collapse of communism in 1989, a new, younger, secular Jewish community has emerged from the ranks of assimilated Jews, mainly communists, who considered themselves Poles of Jewish origin.

Their offspring, says Gebert, are almost exclusively the products of mixed marriages, and would have been lost to the Jewish people if not for the dissolution of communism.

By conventional halachic standards, a good many of them are not Jewish. "But our criteria for Jewishness is elastic," observes Gebert, whose father was a Catholic. "To us, a Jew is someone who's aware of and interested in the Jewish community as well as Jewish culture."

Basically, these so-called "new Jews" are much more assimilated than their pre-World War II ancestors and far more at ease in Polish society, explains Gebert, a foreign affairs columnist who writes for Poland's largest daily newspaper, Gazeta Wyborcza, under the pseudonym of David Warszawski

Gebert, who was recently in Toronto to give a talk for the Joseph and Gertie Schwartz Memorial Lecture series, believes there are approximately 30,000 such Jews in Poland today.

They are not part of the official, 4,000-strong Jewish community. But, he hastens to add, "This is not an anti-establishment movement. Young people simply find it hard to relate to the older, less assimilated Jewish community."

As Gebert tells it, the new Jewish community arose with the triumph of democracy. "Today, Jews are free to express themselves as Jews without fear of consequences. There is a general climate of openness in things Jewish." During the pre-war and Communist eras, Jewishness was stigmatized, and there was an implied incompatibility in being Polish and Jewish.

The most active and committed members of the new community are observant, if not religious. And they tend to be its leaders and innovators.

They were in the forefront of establishing the first Jewish kindergarten in decades in 1989. And they pushed for a Jewish elementary school, which opened last spring.

The community is also served by youth clubs, adult education programs and summer and winter camps. There are two rabbis, both in Warsaw. One is an Israeli of Polish origin, while the other is an American.

"Eventually, we hope to have our own local rabbis," says Gebert. Since the mid-1980s, several students interested in the rabbinate have studied at yeshivot in the United States. None has returned to Poland.

Gebert points out that the renewal of Jewish life was made possible by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation in New York, which dispenses philanthropic funds in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. "We've gotten hundreds of thousands of dollars in the past five years." Without this assistance, the ambitious plans of the community might never have been realized. (The older community is funded by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.)

In his view, the new community is wrestling with three fundamental problems.

"The first is ourselves. There was a great interest and excitement in discovering our Jewish roots. But I can't say it will last. I'm still not convinced there are enough of us to carry this through."

If it is to survive and thrive, the new Jewish community will have to be financially self-sufficient. "A supported community like ours degenerates."

The challenge is to reclaim old Jewish properties which were confiscated by the Communist authorities. "This takes us into huge legal and political problems, but I'm relatively optimistic that some of the property can be reclaimed, so that the community can be self-supporting again."

The Polish government is anything but eager to address the issue, and not because it is anti-Semitic. "It's really a can of worms," Gebert says. "Giving Jews back property would leave the government open to German claims. One-third of present-day Poland was German before 1939. There is a concern that people will lose their homes."

Anti-Semitism and the future of Polish democracy is the third problem facing Jews.

"There was a sharp increase in anti-Semitic agitation after 1989 — graffiti, some acts of physical violence, the publication of anti-Semitic books, the formation of six anti-Semitic political parties (which failed to win a single seat)."

During the 1990 presidential election, the leading contender and current president, Lech Walesa, injected an anti-Jewish note into the campaign. "He doesn't have any personal animus against Jews, and is moved by the Shoah. But he saw nothing wrong in using anti-Semitism as a political tool. He was being expedient."

In the past two years, there has been a noticeable decline in anti-Semitic activity. "Open anti-Semitism has been pushed aside, but not repealed in Polish public life. It's no longer considered genteel, but it still lurks in the background."

Despite their poor showing at the polls, anti-Semitic parties continue to exist. In October, a leading anti-Jewish politician, Boleslaw Tejkoski, was handed a one-year suspended sentence. He was charged with insulting Polish authorities, Jews and bishops.

"Tejkoski is completely bonkers, but he's dangerous because he has a following of thousands of skinheads."

Gebert is convinced that Polish democracy is not endangered. "But things could change. If this happens, Jews could be at risk." Even if democracy breaks down, Jews will not necessarily emigrate. "Poland is home, despite the opinions of some overzealous Zionists."

Gebert, 41, is from a completely assimilated family. His mother, Krysyna Poznanska, and his father, Boleslaw, were pre-war communists who believed in and worked for the Communist system. She was a journalist, he a diplomat. In his last posting in the 1960s, he was ambassador to Turkey, where Gebert learned his fluent English.

Gebert was raised as a Pole. "I knew my mother was Jewish, but it was irrelevant, accidental and unimportant."

When his parents returned to Poland from Turkey in 1967, the state-orchestrated anti-Zionist (read anti-Semitic) campaign had already begun. His mother lost her position; his father retired. "Both were terribly disappointed and disillusioned. They withdrew, emotionally and intellectually, from the Communist party. They didn't emigrate because they were fighters."

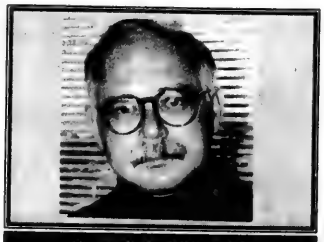
Gebert himself was expelled from school, a development which heightened his interest in his Jewish background. He began reading Jewish literary classics in Polish, and in 1976, he and like-minded individuals formed the Flying University, a hotbed of debate on Jewish identity in contemporary Poland.

In the mid-1970s, he experienced his first Shabbat at a relative's home in London and thoroughly enjoyed it.

His parents were displeased, but he persevered. "I was too stinking proud not to be a Jew. But I did not relinquish my Polish identity."

Gebert and his Catholic wife have raised their four children as Jews. The family not only observes Shabbat and Jewish holidays, but attends synagogue.

Are they are the prototypes of the new Polish Jew? Time will tell.



Jewish World

By Sheldon Kirshner

Six years after his death at the age of 70, Ed Parker is not exactly a luminary in the annals of Canadian journalism. Parker, after all, was not a great reporter like, say, the late Bruce Hutchison. Rather, his legacy is the School of Journalism and Graphic Arts at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute in Toronto.

The son of a Winnipeg Jewish immigrant and Yiddish newspaper editor, Parker founded the School of Journalism in 1948, less than a decade after his appointment as editor of the University of Manitoba student newspaper.

Sandwiched in between was a moderately successful career as a reporter in Winnipeg, Montreal and Ottawa; a wartime publicity officer for the federal government; a political campaign organizer; a magazine and "throwaway" newspaper editor; and a freelance writer in Europe.

Before he died, Parker committed his memories to paper. I Didn't Come Here To Stay (Natural Heritage, $14.95) traces his life from Winnipeg's North End to his public relations practice in Toronto in 1962. His memoirs end there, incompleted.

I Didn't Come Here To Stay is not a memorable work. Hardly reflective, it skims over the surface in a hurried, episodic style, never really giving a reader the true measure of the author.

Parker's parents, Harry and Raezel, were Polish Jews who immigrated to Canada in the first years of this century. Harry was a compositor and linotype operator who later edited the Israelite Press.

At St. John's High School, Parker became managing editor of the school newspaper. Later, at Winnipeg's United College, Parker was assistant news editor of The Manitoban. Parker, however, claims that his "career in journalism" really began as the college correspondent of the Winnipeg Tribune, a daily he joined after editing the University of Manitoba's student newspaper.

At the U of M, Parker studied law, but his heart was not in it. In 1940, he was hired by the Winnipeg Tribune to churn out advertising copy and to edit the entertainment section.

A year later, Parker found himself on the staff of the Montreal Star. Disheartened, he returned to Winnipeg and launched a throwaway "shopping paper," which didn't last. After his father's death, he angled for an "editorial role" on the Israelite Press, but nothing materialized.

Parker then toiled as a publicity officer in the Department of Munitions and Supply. In 1944, Nathan Cohen, the precocious editor of the Glace Bay Gazette (and, subsequently, the drama critic of the Toronto Star), offered him the position of managing editor. Instead, he accepted an offer from the CCF party in Saskatchewan to organize its next campaign.

In the pages that follow, Parker describes his association with a left-wing magazine in Vancouver, a show business weekly in Winnipeg, and the Ottawa Journal. He also recalls his freelancing days in Prague.

I Didn't Come Here To Stay concludes as Parker establishes Ryerson's School of Journalism, works for the mining magnate Joseph Hirshhorn and sets up his own business.

It's a competent memoir, but it could have been far better.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI KENNETH KATZ

When I read the Torah, I always feel sympathy for the villains.

I think the Torah means for us to feel this. As much as we like to fancy ourselves as righteous and as moral as Moses, I think we usually act more like the self-centred and pragmatic Korah. Instead of the deep life-long struggles of Jacob, many of us would prefer the simplicity of Esau.

The Torah's heroes raise a very high standard. But the villains, usually just people with ordinary failings like our own, allow us to put ourselves in the story. I can see myself more easily urging Abraham to stay in Haran than to plunge into the unknown, chasing God's mysterious words.

It is important to see ourselves in the story because the Torah only speaks to us when we can bring it off the page and into our lives and imaginations. We have to see how its characters and situations are like our own. So let us look at this week's villains.

In this week's Torah portion, we conclude the Joseph story and read about the deaths of both Jacob and Joseph. Jacob, who thought Joseph was dead, lives to bless Joseph and Joseph's children. Joseph's brothers, who had tried to do away with Joseph, are reconciled, and the story concludes with the recognition that God stood behind all of the story's human complications. "God will surely remember you." (50:25)

But not everyone in the story accepts the idea of God's hidden hand. Yes, Jacob and Joseph are great believers in God's mysterious hand, and are also deeply devoted to one another. Years before, Jacob had given the teenage Joseph the famous coat of many colors, and he now singles out Joseph and Joseph's sons for blessing. Joseph provides his father with a regal funeral, dwarfing his brothers' contributions to the funeral. But Jacob, on his deathbed, is not above cursing some of his sons (49:3-7), or giving others rather mediocre blessings (49:14). Joseph is his favorite to the end.

Let us see the story from the brothers' point of view. Despite Joseph's protests that it is God who directs all, the brothers fear Joseph to the end. They don't see the story Joseph's way. Rather, they see a dangerous family story, where 'father always loved him best,' and where Joseph now has power over them.

After Jacob's funeral, the brothers feel the need to invent false last words of Jacob. They send Joseph the message, "Before his death, your father left this instruction: So shall you say to Joseph, 'Forgive, I urge you, the offense and guilt of your brothers who treated you so harshly.' " (50:14-21).

In grade school we learned Joseph was the hero and the brothers were the villains of the story. Joseph came through slavery, exile and imprisonment with virtue and faith intact. The brothers are free, yet they are jealous, self-centred and devious.

Joseph is clearly more admirable. Yet it is the way of the Torah that the "villains" are presented sympathetically. Who can fault the brothers when they decide to lie to Joseph to protect themselves? It is these characters, as much as the heroes, who can make the Torah live in our imaginations, and so in our lives.

Rabbi Kenneth Katz is the spiritual leader of Congregation Beth-El in Montreal.

Post-war Germans said blameless for Holocaust

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Visiting German President Roman Herzog said last week that his post-World War II generation could not be blamed for the Holocaust but that it must learn lessons from the past.

"The vast majority of my compatriots were born after the downfall of the Third Reich or were still children in the last years of Hitler's dictatorship," Herzog said at a state dinner hosted by President Ezer Weizman.

"This generation is free of guilt, but it is not free from the obligation to learn from what has happened," he said.

Herzog, born in 1934, said it was Germany's responsibility to keep alive the memory "of the darkest chapter in our history and to show the next generations what Germans were and of what human beings are capable."

Herzog said he understood concerns in Israel and elsewhere over Germany's unification, but that five years after the fall of the Berlin Wall, most of these voices have fallen silent.

"The world has taken notice that an increase in economic power and responsibility is not tantamount to delusions of grandeur or hunger for power," Herzog said.

He also addressed fears about growing right-wing extremism in Germany. "We understand these concerns very well and take them seriously. But such terrible incidents must not let us forget that Germany today is no longer the Germany of the 1920s, 1930s or even the 1940s.

"It is a national and global task to fight against radicalism and racism wherever it raises its head," Herzog said. "We will play our part and fight against extremists offensively and with all permissible means."

Welcomed at Beit Hanassi by Weizman, Herzog was reminded that despite close relations, friendship and extensive cooperation, "the past cannot be forgotten and events that took place in Germany and in Europe will always be before our eyes and in our minds."

Negev Dinner draws 1,200 to fete Tanenbaum

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you ask any of the almost 1,200 supporters who attended the 46th Annual Negev Dinner of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Toronto honoring Joey Tanenbaum, they would say it was an overwhelming success in every way.

The Nov. 27 reception and dinner at the Sheraton Centre Hotel were filled with warmth and nostalgia as speaker after speaker reflected on the 62-year-old honoree, a philanthropist, community leader, entrepreneur and patron of the arts.

It also raised close to $4 million, which will be used to establish a nature and environment study institute for youths at JNF's Camp Yatir in the northern Negev.

Following greetings from Israeli consul Dror Zeigerman, premier Bob Rae and Lt.-Gov. Henry Jackman, the first Chanukah candle was lit by Joey and Toby Tanenbaum's five children: Michael, Alan, Martin, Robert and Susan.

Dinner chair Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto, welcomed the guests and spoke of Tanenbaum's "abundant, overflowing generosity."

Tanenbaum, a civil engineering graduate of the U of T, told the story of how grandfather Abraham Tanenbaum arrived in Toronto in 1911 with $8 in his pocket and founded Runnymede Metal and Salvage Co.

Tanenbaum said his grandfather taught him many lessons in ethics and business. From his grandmother he learned "one must always share with one's fellow man, regardless of how little one has.

"Both of my grandparents helped me understand and take pride in what it meant to be a Jew," he said.

He said he and his wife believe very strongly in Canada and in Israel. "Our five children are the living proof of what it means to grow and to flourish in the most democratic and free nation on earth."

In a unscheduled speech, Toby Tanenbaum announced she and her children will dedicate an educational building at Yatir to be known as the Joey Tanenbaum Centre for Art and Music, in tribute to Joey's love of the arts. "He is a type of realist who believes in miracles," she said.

Campaign chair Ronald Appleby said this Negev Dinner was one of the largest moneymakers in Canada. "My friend Joey is making this world what we want it to be," he said.

Program participants included JNF Toronto president Patricia Alpert, Bill Wolff, Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum of the Toronto Lubavitcher organization and Rev. Noah Wolff.

Aish HaTorah benefactor Leslie Dan and past president Harvey Hecker (in hard hats) break ground on the site of the new Aish HaTorah community centre in Vaughan.

Ground broken for Aish HaTorah centre

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Aish HaTorah Toronto broke ground earlier this month for its new $2-million community and activity centre north of Toronto.

The Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre, now just a grassy lot on Clark Avenue west of Bathurst Street, will be "the first North American centre devoted solely to Jewish continuity," said Aish HaTorah's Rabbi Ephraim Shore.

The 20-year-old outreach and education movement has been in Toronto since 1981. The newest centre, scheduled to open in fall 1995, will eventually replace the four other program centres in the Toronto area.

The 17,000-square-foot centre is the latest Aish HaTorah project to bear the Dan family name. In October, Novopharm chair Leslie Dan and his wife Judy inaugurated the Aish HaTorah World Centre-Dan Family Building Canada in Jerusalem's Old City.

The Dans donated $10 million towards the Jerusalem centre, and $1 million towards the Vaughan centre.

The soft-spoken Dan told The CJN he has studied at Aish HaTorah for over six years. "The important thing is to help our Jewish people to continue," he said. "[Aish HaTorah] brings out people's Yiddishkeit and makes them proud of it."

Finta honored

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Imre Finta, who was acquitted on a number of war crimes charges, was the recipient last week of an award from the Hungarian Authors World Club, presented at the Korona Restaurant on Bloor Street.

The award was for a Hungarian-language book whose title translates loosely as The Prince and the Pauper.

About 70-80 people, some from Cleveland and Vancouver, were expected to attend the Hungarian-language event. Many, including members of the authors club, are regular restaurant-goers, said Korona owner John Harmat.

The event, which was publicized in Hungarian-language posters, drew the attention of Canadian Jewish Congress, which contacted Harmat. "We explained that we believed it was offensive that anyone would make an association with Finta and that many Jews of Hungarian descent would find this distasteful," said Congress spokesman Bernie Farber.

Harmat told The CJN he didn't know Finta would be involved in the event when he signed the booking contract. When he learned of Finta's involvement, it was too late to back out without triggering a law suit, he said.

Harmat said he told the organizers that "if anything racial, political or religious goes [on], I'll stop the whole thing.

"I have many Jewish friends," he continued. "My best friend is Jewish. I didn't want to get in the middle of this. Mr. Finta is a free man. I don't want to get in the middle."

Dr. Arthur Eidelman checks out one of "his babies" at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre. The mother is one of many who deliver more than five or six children at Shaare Zedek.

Shaare Zedek to open maternal/infant centre

TORONTO — Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, which has the highest number of births of any facility in the Greater Jerusalem area, will soon be constructing a unique Maternal and Infant Centre to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing Israeli population.

Speaking at the annual general meeting of the New Leadership Division of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, Dr. Arthur Eidelman, director of the Medical Centre's Neonatology Department, explained that the new facility would, in one location on one floor, care for infants and their families literally from conception (or prior, if there are problems) to birth and discharge to home.

In addition to a full range of treatment options, a current educational program to help couples with parenting skills will be expanded.

The program is now offered at Shaare Zedek for parents with at-risk newborns who have been treated in the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit, in order to assure that these parents have the backup required at home and that all parents of such infants have been trained in their care.

Last year, approximately one-third of all births in Greater Jerusalem took place at Shaare Zedek — 5,053, a record for both the Medical Centre and the city. It is expected that the total for 1994 will be significantly higher.

Increased demand for services

With the continual increase in demand for services, the Maternity and Neonatology facilities are too small and, to Eidelman's distress, Shaare Zedek has to close the doors to its Maternity Department at least once a week. Patients are directed elsewhere. (In Toronto, this is also a common occurrence and patients are often sent to Hamilton or Ottawa.)

The Neonatal Intensive Care Unit, built for 10 incubators, now has 24 and still cannot accept all the referrals from other institutions.

The newly expanded Neonatal Unit will start out with 30 beds and will be able to accommodate 40. The delivery room, which now has eight individual birthing cubicles, will be doubled in size and the nursing space for well newborns will also be expanded. The new equipment will be the most modern and sophisticated available.

Rooms for the new mothers will be enlarged to allow for those who wish to keep their babies with them rather than in the nursery.

The need for this expansion was acceleratred after 1986, with the opening of the Sara and Al Waxman Centre for Maternal and Fetal Medicine, which specialized in the care of high risk pregnant women and their newborns, and the opening of Shaare Zedek's In Vitro Fertilization Unit.

Matas reaches into history for new book

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Youngsters (and older readers) who learned about the Holocaust through the eyes of the fictional protagonist in Daniel's Story, Carol Matas's poignant 1993 novel, can anticipate reading about a subsequent chapter in Jewish history when the book she is now researching comes out, probably in the fall of 1996.

The prolific Winnipeg author of young adult and children's fiction was in Toronto recently to interview people who were involved in brichah or Aliyah Bet (the illegal immigration to Palestine following World War II), the subject of the upcoming book. She has also begun interviewing in Winnipeg.

Matas is still seeking survivors of Aliyah Bet, and can be contacted through Pnina Zilberman at the Holocaust Education Centre in Toronto (phone (416) 635-2883, ext. 144) or in Winnipeg through the Jewish Historical Society (204) 942-4822.

Carol Matas

While here, Matas attended the opening of Lisa, the play she and her husband, Per Brask, adapted from her 1987 novel. The book was inspired by the rescue of Danish Jews during World War II.

Golden Horseshoe Players, a non-profit professional theatre company based in Toronto, is presenting the play in Ontario schools. It has also played in Montreal and Winnipeg.

Matas, who began her writing career with science fiction, said she felt compelled to write Lisa after her husband, a Dane, told her about his family's resistance activities during the war.

"I was university educated and Jewish and I hadn't heard about the Danish rescue. I felt I had to tell this story," said Matas.

Originally Matas felt that as the daughter of Canadian-born parents (her father was the late Judge Roy Matas), she did not have the right to chronicle the Holocaust. She felt, however, that she had a connection to the Danish rescue through her husband.

When Daniel's Story was commissioned by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington to accompany an exhibit, Matas felt she had been "given permission" to write about the Holocaust.

The book has been nominated for several Canadian awards and has been named the recipient of the Ontario Library Association's Silver Birch Award for 1994, after being voted on by almost 9,000 Ontario schoolchildren. Matas will be presented with the award in January.

Among her other award-winning books are Lisa, Jesper (the sequel to Lisa) and Sworn Enemies, a story of two Jewish teens in Czarist Russia, one who kidnaps Jewish boys for the army, the other his victim.

Some of Matas's other books feature Jewish characters, although they don't deal with specifically Jewish issues.

"The fact that she's Jewish is just kind of there," said Matas of the main character in The Lost Locket, a book for Grades 1 to 3. "I think it's nice for Jewish kids, and I also think it's nice for other kids to realize, 'She's just like me, and she just happens to be Jewish.' "

Matas's most recent books, which appeared in the fall, are Of Two Minds, a fantasy, and The Burning Time, a historical novel about persecution of women accused of being witches in 18th-century France.

Matas tries to write about topics that have not been addressed in children's literature. "I think the act of reading should be pleasurable and exciting, and part of that is from reading something you've never read before."

She invites readers to "explore questions" with her. "I never want to give answers. The worst books are the ones that tell children the answers.

"A big failing in young adult fiction is not giving kids enough credit and not realizing how grown up they are."

Play sparks students interest in the theatre

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though they gave their rapt attention to a drama about a Jewish girl's rescue from the Nazis in Denmark, the 160 senior students from Holy Blossom Temple's Religious School could hardly wait for it to end to pepper the lone actor with questions about how to get on the stage.

The Grades 6, 7 and 8 boys and girls wanted to know how to break into the business, how long it took her to learn her lines, if she's hoping to get a movie role and if she gets nervous before every performance.

Ashleigh Hendry, 20, who plays the heroine in the Golden Horseshoe Players production of Lisa, took the questions in stride.

The daughter of Tom and Judith Hendry, two theatre veterans, she said it took her only a week to learn the lines, she's been acting since she was 12, and she's waiting patiently for her first movie offer. If she wasn't nervous before the curtain goes up, she wouldn't do a good job, she said.

Only one student asked about the content of the play. Winnipegger Carol Matas and her husband Per Brask, adapted Lisa from the novel of the same name, itself a composite of several true stories. Matas has written a sequel to Lisa, called Jesper.

Hendry did a competent job in playing the 14-year-old girl who kills a German soldier on the beach while a large group of Danish Jews is awaiting rescue by a Swedish ship. Her vocal range at times failed to stretch enough to convey the depth of emotions, and her efforts were undermined by failure to shut or even dim the lights in the Philip Smith Auditorium.

Artistic director Sharon Enkin said the company has presented Lisa 15 times in Toronto. It will be presented at Har Zion Temple in December.

Debate weighs pros, cons of peace process

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Two distinguished North American Jewish leaders heatedly debated the Arab-Israeli peace process recently.

Stephen Cohen of Montreal, founder of the Montreal-based Centre for Middle East Peace and Development and president of the Washington-based Centre for Middle East Peace and Economic Cooperation, is a staunch supporter of the peace process.

He was pitted against Morton Klein of Philadelphia, president of the Zionist Organization of America. Klein recommends slowing down or suspending the peace process.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, moderated the debate at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto. An estimated 300 people attended.

Cohen argued that there is now growing support among the Arab leaders for a peaceful co-existence with Israel. Klein challenged that view, saying neither Syrian president Hafez al-Assad nor PLO leader Yasser Arafat can be trusted because neither one is serious about peace.

Cohen told The CJN he has played "an informal roll" in peace negotiations, working behind the scenes for the last 20 years.

He has met with all the key Arab leaders, including Assad and Arafat, to convey messages from Israeli leaders. Cohen visits Israel twice a month to continue his work in the peace negotiations.

Cohen told the audience that many moderate Arab leaders feel threatened by the growth of Islamic fundamentalism, and are establishing relations with Israel for pragmatic reasons.

These leaders recognize that peace could bring economic prosperity — U.S. economic aid hinges on peace — to the region and check the expansion of fundamentalism, he said.

Militant, anti-Semitic vision a serious threat to Israel

The fundamentalist vision is militant and anti-Semitic, and its growth is a serious threat to Israel, Cohen said. Conversely, peace in the region is a desirable outcome for Israel, he said.

Klein told the audience that Arab hatred and mistrust of Jews is strongly entrenched, and that land exchanged for peace is a grave security risk because Assad and Arafat have not proven they want a lasting peace.

Klein is the creator of the Peace Accord Monitoring Groups in the U.S. Congress, which monitors violations of the accord and links U.S. aid to the PLO with Arafat's compliance with the Israel-PLO peace accord.

According to Klein, Arafat has seriously violated the peace accord by not condemning violence against Israelis or punishing terrorists, and by not revoking the PLO covenant calling for the destruction of the state of Israel.

He said Assad, now spending 44 per cent of his country's GNP on weapons, is not even trusted by Arabs. "Assad is not a man of his word. He will do whatever is in his best interest."

But Cohen stressed the necessity of looking beyond the leaders' words to their actions. He cited Assad's decision to let the Syrian Jews leave as a concrete, positive action signifying a change in policy. But Klein called this a token gesture.

Levitts goes international

MONTREAL — Montreal-based Levitts Kosher Foods Inc., the largest supplier of kosher beef products in Canada, has gone international.

In May, the 55-year-old company founded by Jewish immigrant Nathan Levitt became the sole supplier of kosher beef, veal and lamb products to Sweden, Finland and Norway.

Jerusalem Kibbutz offers Jewish work/study program

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Only three months after receiving smichah, Rabbi Danny Schonbuch, 27, is on his way to realizing his goals.

"I want to spend my life teaching and trying to create a revolution in the Jewish world," he said in a recent interview.

"Amongst students specifically, I want to change the way the average non-committed student relates to Judaism. Judaism has tremendous depth and excitement. I hope I can show students that [they can have] a personal connection with Judaism."

Rabbi Schonbuch, who was born in New York and moved to Toronto with his family at age 8, completed his rabbinical studies in August at Yeshivat Knesset Beth Eliezer in Jerusalem, where he now lives. He also has a bachelor's degree in education from the Talmudic University of Florida.

His educational and rabbinic training will come into play as a teacher/counsellor for Jerusalem Kibbutz, a new work-study program for 18- to 30-year-olds. Rabbi Schonbuch was in Toronto recently promoting the program.

The idea behind Jerusalem Kibbutz was to create a "Jewish peace corps" in the Old City, said Rabbi Schonbuch.

Rabbi Danny Schonbuch

The brainchild of Rabbi Natan Greenberg, a former Hillel rabbi in Los Angeles, the Jerusalem Kibbutz has a staff of four. Its first program, for about 20 participants, is scheduled to run from Dec. 20 to Jan. 4.

Mornings will be spent on volunteer work projects, such as rebuilding ruins or doing home renovations for residents of West Jerusalem. Afternoons will be devoted to educational programming, including touring and seminars.

The Jewish view of love, relationships, bioethics and the environment are among the issues to be addressed. Touring and Shabbat programming are also part of the package.

The program costs $479 (US), including airfare from New York to Israel. It has been subsidized by individuals, Rabbi Schonbuch said.

The Jerusalem Kibbutz is geared to people with a limited Jewish background, he noted. Rabbi Schonbuch himself is from a traditional Conservative family and is a baal teshuvah (as is his wife, Daniella, a native of Vancouver whose mother, Sheila Anzarut, is immediate past president of the Women's Division of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver).

Rabbi Schonbuch was the founder of NAHON (North American High School Organization Network) when he was a a Grade 10 student at North Toronto Collegiate. NAHON was modeled on Network Canada, the national Jewish student group known for its activism and confrontation of issues affecting the Jewish community. Rabbi Schonbuch credits Network with influencing his own life and vocation.

For more information about the Jerusalem Kibbutz, call 416-665-2511 or e-mail to to heritage @ jerusalem1.data serv.co.il.

Seniors' use of drugs examined

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A patient who brought in a shopping bag full of 35 different medications ended up using only one of them — eye drops — after she was given a thorough examination, Dr. Michael Gordon, vice-president of Baycrest Medical Services, told a meeting here recently.

In another case, a 78-year-old had his medications drastically reduced, and although disoriented and confused when admitted, he was able to function normally for three years once most of the drugs were stopped.

Speaking on the topic, Drugs in the elderly, how do we get value for our money? Gordon said overmedication for the elderly is one reason for a cost of more than $1 billion a year to the Ontario Drug Benefit (ODB) program.

Gordon was one of the participants at the Dr. Ira Pollock clinic day on issues in geriatric medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital, attended by physicians and health care workers.

Another factor in the big drug bill is the filling of prescriptions monthly, with a dispensing fee each time, when in many cases a new prescription is not required monthly, Gordon said.

Challenged by two audience members who said it may be risky to give a six-month supply of drugs to frail and elderly patients, Gordon replied: "Many thousands of healthy, well-functioning people go every month to have prescriptions renewed."

Asked by a woman in the audience what she should do if the pharmacist wants to issue the drug monthly even if the prescription is for a longer period, he said, "It's okay if they don't charge a dispensing fee each time."

One audience member complained that a pharmacist said the drug had to be renewed monthly "to ensure a fresh supply."

A community hospital geriatrician said he was "deeply offended" by officials at the ODB program who wanted to change his prescriptions.

A "colossal" cost to the ODB program of drugs never used was cited by one participant. Gordon agreed, saying, "The cost of the drug is only a small part of the total cost to the system."

Gordon said, "It is possible to give a nine-months supply on one prescription. The repeat prescription habit is very costly. I suggest physicians address this problem with the question, 'Is there any reason not to give a multiple prescription?' "

Both Gordon and Dr. Jerry Tenenbaum, Baycrest consultant in rheumatology, agreed that it is often wise to give elderly patients opiates at night to help them sleep, but that patients have to guard against using stronger drugs all the time for this purpose.

Hebrew U fosters leadership in overseas students, says vice-provost

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Israel Roi, vice-provost of the Rothberg School for Overseas Students at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, attended the recent General Assembly of Jewish Federations in Denver, he met a lot of alumni.

Overseas students have studied at the Hebrew U since 1925, and in formal programs since 1955. The Rothberg School dates back to 1971.

"I met people from the first program in 1955 up to and including last year," Roi said of the community leaders he met in Denver.

"[It's] amazing. We're doing something that has a major impact on the Jewish community worldwide."

Roi, in Toronto recently, said some of the school's programs now have a leadership development component.

"It's a very common thing to hear people talk about [the Hebrew University] changing their lives. It's such an intensive experience," he said.

In addition to the one-year study program for overseas students, the Rothberg School offers preparatory programs for olim. There are close to 100 Canadians among the 1,000 overseas students at the school, and most courses are accredited by Canadian universities. An additional 500 students are enrolled in the preparatory program, some just considering aliyah.

Israel Roi

Roi, 58, is himself an alumnus of the Hebrew University, where he completed a master's degree in Jewish history in the early 1960s. A native of London, England, he took his undergraduate degree at Oxford before making aliyah in 1959.

One of the reasons for Roi's visits to Toronto and Vancouver was to meet parents of Rothberg School students. In his 20 years as vice-provost, he has seen an increasing parental awareness of the "Jewish identity component" associated with a year of study in Israel.

Often the distance to Israel causes parental concern, although that has been lessened with the advent of e-mail and with the installation of individual phones in student dormitories. "Many students are in touch on a regular and sometimes even a daily basis through e-mail," Roi said.

The school recently inaugurated its first formalized graduate program taught in English and is awaiting construction of a new building, which was dedicated in September. The current building, which dates back to the 1930s, is inadequate for the school's growing student population. The new building should be completed within three years.

The vice-provost encourages students to seriously consider spending a year studying in Israel.

"This is the ideal time of life to do it. [If you're looking for] enrichment, roots, identity, to do this within what we hope and believe is a first-rate academic program is the sort of opportunity we think is a shame to forego."

BOXING DAY COMES EARLY

Boxing day has come a little early this year for more than 500 students at the Associated Hebrew Schools as they prepare for their move to the new Atkinson campus on Jan. 3. Having attended classes in portables at the back of the Promenade Shopping Mall on Clark Avenue in Thornhill, these eager students and their teachers are looking forward to the comforts of a modern school. When full occupied in September 1995, the Atkinson campus will serve nearly 1,200 students and faculty. Seen (from left) grade 1 students from the portables Steven Biner, teacher Ruth Parker, Elanna Nussbaum and Brandon Farb help pack up. [Randy Spiegel photo]

TODAY'S UJA

1995 Campaign Update

Ten, nine, eight, seven ... It's the Campaign countdown as we call contributors by the hundreds to finalize 1995 gifts. Your pledge alone is enough to secure funding for vital services. The official campaign may come to a close when December ends, but there's never a time limit on Jewish needs.

UJA donations, for example, have played a special role in assisting Syrian Jewry. Since Spring 1992, Syria has allowed individual Jews to leave, but not entire families. They cannot travel directly to Israel, so they first emigrate elsewhere - usually, the United States. Those who choose Israel, fly from the U.S. So far this year, the UJA funded Jewish Agency has spent about $1.1 million to better the lives of Syrian olim. According to Agency reports, most of the Syrian immigrants are in difficult financial circumstances and require ongoing UJA support.

Today's UJA offers a Mazel Tov fit for a Federation President to Bernie Ghert and his wife Judi on their first grandchild. He's a boy, Amitai, born to Renee Ghert Zand and husband Joel. Bernie, by the way, is also a former UJA co-chairmen.

While we're dispensing Mazel Tovs, here's to dutiful, diligent and now delighted Women's Campaign canvasser Doreen Manly and her husband, Sheldon. They're delighted because son Stephen recently married Sharon Domb.

What does a student do after Hebrew U? The answer is obvious - become involved with UJA. That's what Risa Rochwerg is doing, encouraged by her mother Marlene, a veteran Women's campaigner.

UJA's Lawyers Division has taken a more scholarly approach to Campaign '95 and the verdict is positive. The division, chaired by Earl Altman and Sheldon Disenhouse conducted four Lunch 'n' Learn sessions led by Jonathan Livny, a prominent Israeli lawyer and West Bank judge. Lunch 'n' Learn was one of the motivations for UJA's legal mavens to round up a million dollars in pledges.

Lawyers Division co-chairs Sheldon Disenhouse (L) and Earl Altman.

This summer, after UJA co-chairs Robert Masters and Wendy Eisen visited ancient Oguz in distant Azerbaijan, they returned with exuberant news about the small Jewish community there. The Jews of Oguz have managed to survive for thousands of years in this mountain town. Many of them are still farmers, who speak a local language called Tatit. The town's 170 year old synagogue re-opened in August, thanks to the Joint Distribution Committee, and the Jewish Agency is very active in the area. Oguz is another symbol of UJA's influence in every corner of the world.

JF&CS' Wolfe has seen Jewish problems grow

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Jewish Family and Child Service president Garry Foster (left) recently presented a silk screen entitled Dor L'Dor to JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe for 13 years of service to the agency.

TORONTO — A lot has happened during Gordon Wolfe's 13 years as executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) — much of it decidedly unpleasant.

Increased rates of domestic violence, family breakdown, unemployment, divorce and poverty — aspects of modern life that, despite denial and downplaying, exist in the Jewish community — have given the usually unflappable Wolfe more than a few gray hairs and sleepless nights.

Or as he puts it, "we deal with the community's tzuris. Considering the nature of the beast, most people who come to us are not happy."

But judging by its reputation, expanded services and statistics, JF&CS sees many clients leaving at least satisfied.

Wolfe, now in his bar mitzvah year at the agency's helm, looks back on a much-changed community.

"Thirteen years ago, Jewish continuity was unheard of," he told The CJN in a wide-ranging interview. "Families had two parents, 2.3 children and people worked. That arrangement no longer exists on the scale it once did."

Neither does the JF&CS Wolfe came to in 1981. Today, the outfit is one of Metro's largest social service agencies, with a budget of well over $1 million, a staff of 100, 60 of whom are social workers, and services geared to just about any problem.

Those include some of the touchiest — incest, child abuse and spouse assault. Indeed, if there's one societal issue Wolfe would have to call the Jewish community's most pressing, it's violence in the home.

"Our community is horrified at the mere thought of abuse," Wolfe says. "We do it in fewer numbers than the general community, but it happens. It's there."

In 1980, JF&CS received Children's Aid Society status, meaning it's a full-fledged child protection agency. Today, 10 to 15 per cent of cases involve child protection. Six years ago, the community's secretly-located two-room shelter for abused women opened.

As well, JF&CS has teamed up with two other agencies and set up the Metro Special Committee on Child Abuse, whose main thrusts are prevention and assistance.

Wolfe's tenure has also been marked by an alarming rise in the unraveling of the traditional family structure. Ten per cent of Jewish families in Metro are headed by a single parent, 90 per cent of those by women.

Then there is rising divorce, remarriage and step-families. "I've noticed over the years," Wolfe says, "that all this has had a significant impact on children. Parents get on with their lives, but the kids still reel."

The Jewish community is not immune to these and other trends. "It's been hard to hold up the ideal of the Jewish family. The struggle has been to maintain our value system and at the same time, to accept the fraying of the Jewish family.

"The best example of that is the gay community and more gay families. That clashes with our values and traditions, but it's out there."

As is poverty. Fully one-third of JF&CS's caseload involves financial assistance, which tops up the income of families living at or below the poverty line. In all, the agency this year will handle roughly 3,200 cases, of which half are ongoing. Forty per cent of cases are repeat clients. And remarkably, there's no waiting list.

Wolfe has also overseen increased outreach to the Orthodox community, which at one point was considering its own, separate social service agency, and to Jews living north of Steeles Avenue. Four years ago, a York Region branch of JF&CS opened in the Promenade Mall.

These days find the agency in the midst of its fourth strategic planning review. For the first time, Wolfe says, "we're asking our clients what they want." Answer: good social workers.

The biggest challenge facing Wolfe and JF&CS is to keep evolving. "No other agency in Ontario combines child welfare, mental health and family services. We'll just have to keep responding to new needs as they emerge."

Multilingual Word Processing

TORONTO — Dagesh Hebrew-English-Russian word processing software is now available in Canada.

Dagesh allows you to mix Hebrew and English in the same document, write left to right or right to left. There is a spell check, style sheets and word count — even stickers for the keyboard. The user also chooses menus, commands and help features in Hebrew or English.

In the past, this package was available only by special order from the United States. Toronto-based software distributor Massey Canada is importing it.

Dagesh comes in two versions: Dagesh 1.1 and Dagesh Lite, a full-function package for students.

Dagesh is made by Kivun Computers, the company which created the Hebrew version of Windows for Microsoft.

Self-Employment Training Program

TORONTO — A training program to assist entrepreneurs in starting a business, co-ordinated by Self Employment Development Initiatives (SEDI), is showing oustanding success.

Best estimates indicate a 100 per cent return on investments.

SEDI was launched in Toronto in April 1993 to train those on unemployment insurance. The program of organized training and business counselling is funded by Human Resources Development Canada and the end product is mutual responsibility.

Participants ultimately come off unemploument benefits and contribute to the economy by generating sales, paying taxes and providing employment for others.

Hi-tech jobs are found in Israel

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With Israeli companies in the hi-tech fields growing at an average rate of 10 per cent a year, there are plenty of job opportunities for computer professionals and engineers.

Many in Israel have the qualifications to fill the new positions, but talented people from the Diaspora with the appropriate experience will get jobs, said Matti Alush of Softel, an Israeli software company based in Jerusalem.

Alush was one of three representatives who spoke at a recent hi-tech seminar sponsored by the Israel Aliyah Centre, the consulate of Israel's Department of Returning Israelis and Har Hotzvim.

Founded at the beginning of 1993, Softel hoped to increase its staff to 55 from 45 by the end of this year, but so far has been unsuccessful in filling the openings. By the end of 1995, the company is expected to have 80 employees.

Alush said they need mid-level programmers with a few years' experience.

He suggested that job candidates bring a program they have created or a design document with them to interviews. He said he is often greeted with a look of surprise when he asks for work samples.

Softel and other Israeli companies have recently been headhunting in in cities in Canada and the Unites States.

For local interviews, Softel, Enco, Har Hotzvim and Teva Pharmaceutical selected candidates from the 70 resumes they received from Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre.

Jose Barak of the Enco group of companies said there are openings for civil engineers at Encosytems and for marketing staff at Encotone.

An engineering firm with a staff of 80, Encosystems specializes in designing hi-tech facilities for companies. They have created a hi-tech facility for the Weizmann Institute and environments for companies that manufacture semi-conductors for microprocessors.

Encosystems, Barak said, would like to recruit a department manager, civil designers and piping designers. "All of the positions require very good skills in computing design," he added.

Encotone, founded two years ago, has developed a technology that can provide security for remote services such as voicemail and banking by telephone. The company's technology, Barak said, works with an "ever-changing code which cannot be stolen, which can provide secure indentification and can prevent impersonation."

He said the company needs a marketing department head and staff to develop a strategy for marketing the technology.

Yermi Agrat, who interviewed candidates for jobs at companies located in Har Hotzvim, said there are some 150 hi-tech companies in the 15-year-old Jerusalem industrial park. They include INTEL Electronics Ltd., the Digital Technical Centre and ECI Telecom Ltd.

"Our goal is to locate promising entrepreneurs who have ideas or protoypes that might become, within a reasonable period, startups which have some value to propose to the market," said Agrat.

An organization at Har Hotzvim, the HiTEC Technology Entrepreneurship Centre, helps entrepreneurs develop, manufacture and market their hi-tech products by offering technical, managerial and business support; loans of up to $50,000 (US); ready access to government bodies in Israel; and space for project activities at the centre along with office services. Entrepreneurs are expected to have a product ready for marketing within two years.

Of the 300 entrepreneurs that have applied to HiTEC for assistance in the 2½ years of its existence, Agrat said 14 have so far been approved.

HiTEC takes a five to 10 per cent equity position in each company it sponsors, as well as finance fees — if the project gets money from a venture capital fund or private investor — and royalties. It also asks companies to pay rental and office service expenses at cost prices.

Currently HiTEC is financed mainly by public money but Agrat said it hopes to cut the cord once companies begin to succeed.

For HiTEC application forms, call Ehud Savion at the Israel Aliyah Centre (416) 633-4766.

Corporate ethics discussed

TORONTO — Ed Waitzer, the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, was not sure that his audience at a recent wine and cheese party wanted to hear his thoughts on the weighty topic of ethics in the context of corporate governance.

"Corporate governance is a subject that is interesting to lawyers," he said at the event held by the Young Professionals Network of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. "It may be interesting to some of you who are in managerial roles, particularly in the financial services sector."

The 40-year-old lawyer addressed an enthusiastic audience in the downtown boardroom of Dynamic Mutual Funds, speaking about the corporate sector's ability to reform itself without government intervention, and the morality of the enterprise community.

Years ago, he said, the U.S. government mandated car manufacturers to increase energy efficiency in automobiles, without imposing regulations that set out exactly how they were to accomplish this goal. Initially, auto industry leaders balked, citing increased costs, job losses and the stunting of industry growth as the reasons for their opposition.

"The corporate sector, not surprisingly, found all sorts of ways to reduce costs by developing new manufacturing techniques, as opposed to the kinds of things that environmental legislation was promoting at the time, which were waste and emission treatment standards," Waitzer said.

"And what happened was that the drive to increase the efficiency of the product led to the creation of new jobs, led to better products, led to increased competiveness, as opposed to [increasing] costs on the system, which would have happened if the way to get to the result had been simply by regulation."

Waitzer added that the phasing out of CFCs (chlorofluorocarbons) is a more recent example of how corporations have successfully reformed themselves. "What happened was, business was told, 'phase it out,' and business ended up coming up with substitutes, and ended up increasing efficiency, saving money."

As shareholders, he said, church groups and other organizations served as gadflies, campaigning for corporations to take greater social responsibility. Their initiatives were resisted by the corporate sector, but time has legitimized most of their concerns without the need for any intrusive regulation.

"A lot of the issues that the churches and other gadfly groups were making a big deal about even 10 years ago are now commonly accepted by CEOs, and really part of the corporate culture."

When institutional shareholders became active, particularly in the takeover defence area, management intially resisted, Waitzer said, but in short order a wide range of institutional investor concerns were legitimized without regulation and are now commonly accepted.

"The strength of the corporate sector," he said, " has always been its ability to incrementally reform itself along a whole host of areas, but always at the margins; so you never really see the process of reform until you sit back and say, 'Look at what's happened in the last 10 years,' and you all of a sudden realize that major changes have taken place, but none of them were visible along the way."

Waitzer noted that the debate on corporate governance has operated on the assumption that better governance practices will improve corporate performance; yet there is little empirical evident to that effect. "The few studies that have been done are quite inconclusive in terms of correlating better governance with better corporate competitiveness or better managerial performance.

"What I learned from that is the concerns are probably more a reflection of values than an economic or managerial challenge."

Governance practices currently being advocated — independent directors, audit committees, the ability of boards to delegate to committees, separating the role of the chairman from the CEO — came from the corporate community and have largely been implemented without the need for intrusive regulation, but there is still resistance to them.

"The risk of some of the resistance is that if you resist it too much you then create a situation where politicians do feel the need to intervene, because sooner or later there's a crisis and typically their interventions are motivated by political expediencies rather than rational solutions. They're catering to a particular constituency or they're responding to a crisis and the tendency is to overreact," said Waitzer."

Tots to Teens

Tots to Teens is a comprehensive discount savings coupon book for parents of children from infancy to 15 years old.

It offers discounts on a wide range of items — clothing, restaurants, indoor playgrounds, computer lessons, dance lessons, disc jockeys, sporting goods, furniture, CD's, videos, and toys, to name a few of the categories.

There are more than 350 coupons in the Tots to Teens book, covering products and services offered in the Greater Toronto area from Oakville to Pickering, and north to Richmond Hill. The books are valid until the end of 1995, and retail for $22.00 plus G.S.T.

In the Metropolitan Toronto area, there are over 1,000,000 children. Parents are therefore spending a good deal of money on necessities and entertainment for these children, especially at this gift giving time of the year. As the economy opens up, people are more willing to spend, but they want the best possible value, and have a keen eye for savings.

The Tots to Teens coupon book is sold through charities for fundraising. Among the participants to date are B'nai B'rith, Beth Tikvah, Beth Torah, Pride of Israel, Baycrest Hospital, Alpha Omega, Beth Sholom, Hadassah and ORT, with more synagogues and organizations expected to join. There are also 150 retail outlets selling Tots to Teens who are making a donation to Ronald McDonald House, Starlight Foundation, and Variety Village for each coupon book sold.

Tots to Teens offers the retailer a chance to participate in the coupon book, which is also a parents' reference guide to quality children's products and services. By aiming at parents as a target market, the retailer broadens his customer base and creates word-of-mouth referrals for his company, taking advantage of broad distribution through schools, charities, community groups, large corporations and retail outlets across Greater Toronto.

While similar coupon books have been launched successfully in the U.S.,Tots to Teens is one of the first ventures of its kind in the Toronto area. It is also a first for manager Phyllis Lynas, who is very excited about it and looking forward to its success. Tots to Teens is a family owned and operated company, whose members have experience in entertainment, health care and business administration.

Anyone interested in purchasing the Tots to Teens coupon savings book may telephone (905) 509-5140 or fax (905) 509-5141.

Canadian Superstars featured at New Year's Eve Gala

Ring in the New Year at a very exciting and spectacular celebration. Roy Meleca of Starsband Inc. along with the aid of Marla Kay, party consultant are proud to present a fabulous New Years Eve Gala, Saturday December 31, 1994 at The Regal Constellation Hotel, 900 Dixon Road in Toronto.

"We will be featuring a phenomenal line-up of some of Canada's finest musical performers," states Meleca. "The evening will start off with high energy entertainment provided by The Original Starsband Orchestra. They will be followed by Bill King, who will add a special touch of jazz. How about the Motown Sound! Norris Vines will dazzle you with the Motown Sound. It doesn't stop there. Latin recording star, Peter May will perform a medley of love songs as well as add a spice of salsa to the evening. We're very excited to also have Edian Cartel. They are a team of top Canadian artists who's music combines modern dance and hip hop rap. You won't want to stop dancing. Of course, we've saved the best for last. Who better to ring in the New Year at that magical hour, then Juno Award winner Liberty Silver, whose impressive vocal style has enabled her to open for such notables as The Temptations, Harry Belafonte and Natalie Cole. Her unique style of music will captivate you and her dynamic musical interpretations will take your breath away. To add even more excitement throughout the evening, The Extravaganza Dance Sensations will delight our guests with Las Vegas style dance performances."

"Let's not forget about another important aspect of the evening," says Marla Kay. "The gala will also feature a sumptuous 5 course meal that will include an antipasto, pasta, salad, main course and flaming dessert. Each couple will receive a choice of a bottle of red or white wine as well as a champagne toast at midnight. Similar kosher meals will also be available at a slightly higher cost upon request. The tables will all be decorated with party favors and there will be an exciting balloon drop at midnight."

"For those of you who wish to stay overnight at the hotel and not have to worry about drinking and driving, we have secured a limited number of guest rooms at an incredible price of $49.95."

This New Years Eve Gala event is unlike any other ever celebrated in Toronto. No one has ever offered continuous entertainment of this calibre before. Your enjoyment is guaranteed.

The price for this fantastic event is $125 per person. There are only a limited number of tickets for this celebration. Tickets will be sold on a first come, first serve basis. Don't be disappointed. Make your reservation today by calling 1-800-498-8444.

Exciting Opportunities at Branksome

In September, 1995, Branksome Hall will implement several exciting initiatives which are a result of an on-going Strategic Planning process.

True to Branksome's identity, these changes combine the old and the new in a dynamic way. As Rachel Belash, the principal of Branksome, explains, "This new plan enables the school to achieve its most important goal: to provide our students with knowledge, responsibility and courage - in a caring environment - to meet the challenges of the 21st century."

Become leaders in an expanding, changing world

Recognizing an increased demand for primary education in the independent school system, a new class in each of Grades 1, 2 and 3 will be added in September, 1995. Grades 1-6 will be housed in one building, providing a unified Junior School and allowing an expansion of both curricular and co-curricular activities. In addition, Senior Kindergarten will become a full-day programme.

A further development is the creation of a middle division. In September, 1995, Grade 7 will be moving to join Grade 8 and 9 on the east side of Mount Pleasant and opportunities for curriculum development in this division are being explored.

Starting in September, 1995, Branksome will begin the transition to a five-day Residence Programme designed to cater to students from in and around Metropolitan Toronto. With this change, Branksome will be the only independent girls' school in Toronto which exclusively offers this five-day programme.

With these new initiatives, Branksome Hall's students will have the tools, grounding, and confidence to grow and become leaders in the changing and expanding world of the 21st century.

Five Diamond Kosher Cuisine Served at Four Seasons Toronto

In March of this year the Four Seasons Hotel Toronto broke new ground by offering kosher catering services for wedding receptions, bar and bat mitzvahs, cocktail parties, conventions, and elaborate dinners for 70 to 500 guests.

This property, located in fashionable Yorkville, is the only CAA/AAA Five Diamond Award-winning establishment in the city to offer these services.

Operating under the supervision of the Orthodox division of the Toronto Jewish Congress, and approved under the Kashruth Council of Ontario, each menu is custom designed.

Tamir Shanel, Director of Catering, and his team coordinate and oversee the services and execution. Their attention to detail is matched only by the culinary taste of Executive Chef Denis Jaricot.

Whatever the occasion, the staff at the Four Seasons will make it a success. Their incomparable standard of service and presentation is suitable for any type of function from the extremely formal to the relaxed and casual.

Famous for a tradition of uncompromising, innovative cuisine, the culinary masters at the Four Seasons will go to great lengths to assure your complete satisfaction by creating a personalized menu to meet your most exact specifications.

The Four Seasons Toronto boasts 12 spacious rooms to fit any occasion. However, the hotel is particularly proud of its elegant Regency Ballroom which seats 500. This setting provides an appropriate backdrop for many social and corporate events. Or you can experience a spectacular view of the city from Windows on the 32nd floor, with seating for 190.

Managed by Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, this magnificent 380-room hotel, has won the accolades of critics around the world including: the CAA/AAA's Five Diamond Award, Institutional Investor's Best Hotels of the World, Condé Nast Traveler's Top 100 Survey, Successful Meetings Pinnacle Award, and Meeting & Conventions Gold Key Award.

Having been awarded so many honours for its outstanding hospitality, it's nice to know you can now get kosher meals in these elegant surroundings.

Telfer Yachts boater's dream

Like his associates, Colin Telfer's a boating enthusiast first and a salesman second. Talk to anyone at Telfer Yachts, and you'll get the straight goods on used powerboats of every description, priced from $5,000 to infinity, available on the North American market. Telfer's associates are brokers, not salespeople; they buy and sell boats in much the same way as real estate brokers buy and sell houses.

Why buy used, as opposed to new? For one thing, "a boat always looks bigger in the showroom than in the water," says Telfer. Two, a boat's value drops 20% on first use. Three, unlike cars, boats have a useful lifespan of up to 30 years or more (fiberglass doesn't rot). Four, warranties are fully transferrable. And five, if you buy from a broker like Telfer, you'll pay no GST (you will have to pay it if you buy a boat new, from a dealer).

For those who have qualms about buying "someone else's problems," well . . . did you ever hear anyone complain about buying a "used house?"

The floating cottage aspect of a boat is its strongest selling feature: where else can you get housing, travel, recreation, and closeness to nature all rolled into one neat package? Indeed, says Telfer, many boaters keep their craft moored throughout the summer and use it strictly as a cottage — a place for family fun, barbeques on the dock, listening to the ball game (remember that?), or quiet reflection. Or all of the above.

If you love being on the water as well as near it, though, there's nothing to stop you from sailing clear down to Florida and beyond. If you do, Telfer's got you covered; his ongoing relationship with boating concerns in the Sunshine State allows him to attend to your needs while you're there. Telfer will be happy to transport your boat to Florida for a nominal fee.

The expertise of Telfer and his staff will serve you well after your purchase, whether it's giving you practical advice on the operation, care and maintenance of your vessel, or advising you of the best mooring locations. And they'll help you choose a boat that has a high resale value; it's not uncommon to get all your money back and then some on reselling. "Being a boating nut isn't just an asset to working here — it's a prerequisite", says Telfer. "Our customers know they're talking to someone fully knowledgeable — not someone who's just in it for a buck." All of Telfer's five full-time brokers are seasoned boat professionals who "know their boats inside and out" says Telfer.

Telfer's Port Credit showroom is a few feet from Lake Ontario, where he has up to 60 vessels on hand and available for viewing at any given time. "It can be your condo in Florida and your cottage in Georgian Bay," says Telfer. And with no property taxes, hydro bills or toll booths to pay, this "luxury" suddenly seems very affordable indeed.

Gourmet Kosher cuisine at Hyatt Regency Acapulco

Set in the best spot in the hotel, and right next to the pool, the kosher Restaurant in Hyatt Regency Acapulco has proven to be a great success among the members of the Jewish Community.

Opened on November 22nd., and supervised by Rabbi Antebi Meir, Member of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada, and Member of the Maguen David Community in Mexico City, Jewish guests are treated to the best in Kosher cuisine, featuring an array of dishes, inclusive of full dairy Breakfast Buffet, with a selection of Kosher cheeses, freshly sliced fruit and squeezed juices, waffle station, blintzes and more.

For lunch and dinner, a contemporary meat menu with sandwiches, salads, soups and light main courses such as Lamb Chops, Kafta Ground Beef Kebab Flavoured with Tehina Sauce and freshly caught Pacific Seafood are some of the delicacies offered for your enjoyment.

For Shabbat, a traditional dinner is offered on Friday nights, featuring specialities such as a selection of appetizers, with Red Snapper Ceviche, Smoked Trout, or Chicken consommé with Kneidlach. Main courses feature such items as Roast stuffed Half Chicken with pepper sauce or Prime Rib with natural juices, or Grilled Salmon Steak with Lemon.

On Saturdays, a special buffet for lunch with a full salad bar and a choice of main courses is served, such as Brisket of Beef with Mushroom sauce, or Cholent.

Food is served with the traditional Challah and with Kiddush Wine.

Of course, desserts can not be forgotten, and Apple Strudel and Pecan Pie are considered the favourites.

For your convenience, Prayer service is available on the premises daily.

Acapulco is what dreams are made of. And dreams come true at the Hyatt Regency Acapulco. The excitement begins on arrival. The marble lobby at the Hyatt Regency manages to be both spectacular and intimate, always full of people having a marvelous time.

Its 693 rooms in a landmark tower soar 23 stories above the golden sand that ring Acapulco Bay — the Hyatt Regency is grand and beautiful. Here the fun begins and goes on and on. Large, comfortable rooms, are adorned with the famous touches of Hyatt. They are nice to rest in, but both the pool and beach beckons you for a swim.

Poolside is definitely for relaxing, perhaps taking an occasional dip to paddle over to Bar Aquarius our swim-up bar. If that's too much effort, waiters are always available from Bar Capitan to rush drinks over to the thirsty in their lounge chairs.

The beach is the place to learn to waterski, sail, or to wander off and explore the bay in a tiny speed boat. The adventurous will want to try flying without jumping from a plane. In Acapulco it is called parasailing.

Guests are also protected from getting too much sun, by offering thatched beach umbrellas or palapas that dot the sand in front of the Hyatt Regency.

Its four restaurants, four bars, Tennis Club with five flood lit courts and water sport facilities, will make your stay in Acapulco even more pleasant.

Mephisto: the ultimate walking shoe

"If the shoe fits, wear it." Mephisto takes this old adage one step further by offering a range of shoes so form-fitting and comfortable that their proponents (many of them world-famous celebrities) insist on wearing them everywhere, even in the unlikeliest of places. At a board meeting – at a ribbon-cutting ceremony – like a "little rascal", this lovable shoe keeps turning up everywhere it shouldn't. And walking miles and miles.

Most shoe manufacturers design their shoes in isolation of the foot, then hope that enough feet can be shoehorned into them to make the cash register ring. Mephisto has taken the opposite approach by analyzing the physiological needs of the human foot and then developing a shoe to meet those needs. Thirty years after the first pair were fashioned in Alsace, France, they're still made by hand; no fewer than 98 different artisans are involved in the fabrication of each pair of all-natural, all-resoleable shoes. You'll pay a little more for a pair of Mephistos, but you'll get a shoe (or boot, or sandal) that will redefine your idea of comfort. And what price health? We say that if you don't have your health, you don't have anything – but do we really practise what we preach? In our mad rush to cram as many appointments as possible into our business day, how often do we take a quiet walk before our next critical decision or business deal? Do we really smell the roses, or think about doing it – someday?

Mephistos are designed with a myriad of features that can correct or alleviate almost any back problem or foot-related disorder, making them an ideal walking shoe. To put on a pair of Mephistos is to rediscover walking as a form of recreation. Hiking is a Mephisto specialty too, with a variety of styles for the outdoorsperson. Included in this season's offerings are a number of Gore-tex lined boots that offer ample protection from winter's chill and dampness.

Mephisto avoids the celebrity endorsement route taken by many athletic shoe companies. Their market penetration has been so rapid, so "underground" in nature, that they have acquired a cult following of sorts. If you wear them, you're probably (a) a free spirit, (b) a non-conformist, (c) an outright rebel, or (d) all of the above.

Canadian Director Ralph Benisty points to a fourfold increase in sales over the past year as evidence of the shoe's popularity. The Mephisto line is available at two Mephisto boutiques downtown and at better shoe stores nationwide.

You won't find Michael Jordan advertising them, but you will find Margaret Thatcher wearing them – as well as Professor Barnard, Luciano Pavarotti, Queen Sofia of Spain, and other notables. But you don't have to run a country or sing operas to wear Mephistos; you just have to love your feet. If they don't love you back, maybe it's time to get the relationship back on the right foot.

Canada declines invitation to join observer force

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Canada has rejected an appeal to join an international observer force in the Gaza Strip and Jericho, but has agreed to take part in a peace-keeping force on the Golan Heights if asked to do so by Israel and Syria.

Canada is one of seven countries recently asked by Israel and the PLO to participate in a 400-member observer force in the Gaza Strip and Jericho. However, Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet told Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin during his recent visit to Ottawa that Canada would not join the observer force.

"Canada has no particular expertise in this area," explained Canadian Ambassador to Israel Norman Spector, adding that Rabin did not seem disappointed by Canada's response.

In the past, Israel has been unwilling to allow international forces to operate in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, but agreed to a "temporary international presence" in Gaza and Jericho when it signed the Declaration of Principles and the Cairo Agreement with the PLO. In the aftermath of the Hebron massacre, Israel also reluctantly consented to permit such a force to operate in Hebron for three months.

According to an Oct. 23 draft agreement — initialed by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Palestinian Authority Planning Minister Nabil Shaath — the new observer force would be stationed in Jericho and seven Palestinian population centres in the Gaza Strip. It would consist of non-military personnel who would carry pistols for self-defence, and not interfere in the activities of Israeli security or Palestinian police. The force would report to the Palestinian Authority and "help promote stability and encourage economic development."

The vague mandate of the observer force is reportedly one reason for Canada's reluctance to join.

Israeli experts say members of the force could be exposed to danger.

"There is so much pent-up frustration and violence in the Gaza Strip that foreign observers could become the target of attacks," said Dr. Mark Heller of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies.

Only country to reject request

"The members of the international observer force in Hebron were lucky to complete their mandate without any injuries," said Dr. Gerald Steinberg, a defense expert at Bar Ilan University's BESA Centre. "But in Hebron the Israeli army exercised complete military control. In Gaza, there is no clear rule of law. The situation is much more uncertain. So observer forces could easily become hostages and targets for terrorism," he said.

Canada is the only country to date which has rejected the request to join the force. Norway and Turkey have agreed to participate, while the other countries invited to join have not yet responded.

A Norwegian source suggested that the international force would have only a limited observation role. "Their really important work would be in development and in providing general assistance to the Palestinians," he said, noting that the force would consist of engineers and other experts in civilian fields.

Spector said Rabin was "extremely pleased" with Canada's readiness to send peace-keeping troops to the Golan Heights if an accord is reached with Syria.

"Prime Minister Rabin was told by Foreign Minister Ouellet that if and when there is a request for Canada to join a peace-keeping force on the Golan Heights, Canada would be prepared to participate," said Spector.

The Israeli prime minister was unable to obtain such a commitment from the United States during his recent visit there. Members of Israel's right wing and settlement movement have been lobbying U.S. senators and congressmen to reject such a request, arguing that it could cost American lives.

Rabin's ability to convince the Israeli public to support a withdrawal from the Golan Heights depends in large part on the security guarantees he is able to obtain in any agreement with Syria. A commitment by the U.S. and other Western countries to send peace-keeping troops to the Golan could make a withdrawal more palatable to the Israeli public.

Canada already has just over 200 troops in the Israeli-Syrian buffer zone of the Golan Heights under the auspices of the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF), as well as 28 military personnel serving with the Multinational Force and Observers (MFO) in Sinai.

IKEA considers franchise store for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

LOS ANGELES — Swedish furniture manufacturer IKEA is investigating the possibility of opening a store in Israel under a franchise agreement, the company's European-based president stated last week.

In a letter to Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Anders Moberg states that IKEA "is certainly not discriminating against Israel. On the contrary, serious investigations are presently taking place in order to increase our activities in the Middle East area, including Israel."

Moberg also states that "for years IKEA has purchased various products from Israel, including textiles and plastics. We expect such trade will expand considerably next year and in the years to come."

Moberg denied that IKEA ever complied with the Arab boycott of Israel or that the furniture company discriminated against the Jewish state.

"It cannot be ruled out that some individual IKEA employees may have acted in a way that could be misunderstood," he added.

Moberg's letter came in the wake of media reports indicating that IKEA founder Ingvar Kamprad had associated with prominent Swedish fascists during and after World War II. The Wiesenthal Centre urged IKEA to consider expanding to Israel as a means of alleviating concerns about Kamprad's political sympathies and to dispel suggestions that the company had complied with the Arab boycott of Israel.

Rabbi Cooper met last week with IKEA's North American president Goran Carstedt in Los Angeles.

"We view this public commitment to consider establishing a presence in Israel as a concrete sign that they will pay no heed to pressures from the Damascus-based Boycott Committee in making their decisions about the Middle East market place," Rabbi Cooper said.

Leading Reform rabbi comes under fire

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Uri Regev, a leading civil rights activist and Reform rabbi here, has come under fire for a letter he wrote a year ago to a Canadian lawyer attesting to instances of alleged religious discrimination against intermarried couples in Israel.

The letter was solicited from Rabbi Regev to help determine whether a particular family of immigrants to Israel from the former Soviet Union could be granted refugee status in Canada on grounds of religious discrimination in Israel.

The incident follows headline news last summer that hundreds of Israeli immigrants from the former Soviet Union have been admitted to Canada as refugees based on claims of religious discrimination here.

The claims and recriminations resulted in a day-long hearing in Montreal on the matter of Israeli refugees.

Canadian government officials have since responded to Israeli diplomatic protests by claiming that Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), which hears refugee claims, is an arm's length body.

Canada continues to admit Israeli citizens — most of them originally from the Soviet Union — as refugees. Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 30 of this year, the IRB granted refugee status to 344 Israeli citizens and denied it to 445. An estimated 2,000 Israeli citizens still await a hearing.

In his letter of November 1993 on behalf of the Grosman family, who had applied for refugee status in Canada, Rabbi Regev concluded, "The situation of the family in Israel would be truly undesirable and demeaning and would deprive them of basic civil and human rights."

The husband, Yuri Grosman, is Jewish and his wife, Olga, is not.

Rabbi Regev is the director of the Religious Action Centre in Israel, which, among other things, runs advocacy centers throughout the country for new immigrants.

He is also an attorney and key legal combatant, working through the High Court of Justice, against the monopoly of the Orthodox establishment over religious affairs in Israel.

Uri Regev

The letter has laid Rabbi Regev open to charges that he is hurting Israel, Zionism and the Reform movement.

The furor arose earlier this month after the Israeli daily Ha'aretz obtained a copy of Rabbi Regev's letter with the names of the individual family deleted. The letter was apparently being used as a form letter by other Israeli immigrants attempting to gain refugee status in Canada.

Rabbi Regev, who has been aware for several months that the letter was being reissued without his authorization, said he had no idea who made such "unauthorized and improper use" of his letter.

He protested its misuse in a letter to the Grosmans' attorney in Canada several months ago. In the letter, he protested "in the strongest of terms all unauthorized use of these modified letters" and demanded their "immediate cessation."

Despite his concern that the letter was being misused, Rabbi Regev said he stands by the original letter, written Nov. 15, 1993 to an Ontario lawyer in response to an inquiry about possible religious discrimination in Israel against the Grosmans and their daughter, Alissa.

In that letter, Rabbi Regev wrote that "harassment" against mixed marriages, "especially in particularly Jewish neighborhoods, is quite prevalent."

"Beyond the fact of intolerance," he wrote, those in mixed marriages and their children face "serious civil rights problems."

"The difficulties for the family would follow them from birth to death," he said. Such difficulties would range from the refusal of the Orthodox "to perform a ritual circumcision on a son," to the inability of the children to marry Jews in Israel, to the impossibility of burial together "because the cemeteries are run by Orthodox authorities who do not permit burial of a non-Jew next to a Jew and there is no civil burial alternative."

Rabbi Regev said that in answering other periodic inquiries from research coordinators for the IRB, he was careful to distinguish between legitimate and illegitimate claims of religious discrimination.

"Several times I was very clear in countering arguments that had no basis in fact" which claimed religious discrimination, Rabbi Regev said in an interview. "I was quick to set the record straight.

"On the other hand, when asked about issues confronting mixed families, I saw no reason and no way in which I could close my eyes, my ears, my mouth, and refuse, in a professional way, to clarify what the facts were," he said.

"I limited my response to those areas where, unfortunately, the problem is real and acute," he said. "My letter did not recommend that people leave Israel or be given refugee status."

Despite Rabbi Regev's distinctions, he has come under attack from government officials as well as from officials in his own Reform movement.

Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin said in an interview in Ha'aretz that he regretted that Rabbi Regev had lent his stamp of authority to what he termed "an insane situation. I don't believe there's a person in Israel who deserves to be a refugee."

Rabbi Richard Hirsch, head of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, the international umbrella of the Reform movement, said Rabbi Regev's actions were aimed against "Zionism, the state, Judaism and the Reform movement," according to Ha'aretz.

Rabbi Hirsch took pains to dissociate the Reform movement from Rabbi Regev's statements.

"There is a whole debate about religion and state in Israel," said Yehiel Leket, acting chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, which is responsible for bringing immigrants to Israel and also helps fund the Religious Action Centre.

"Many secular and non-Orthodox groups feel uncomfortable with the status quo, and there is a political struggle to change it," he said, referring to an arrangement which gives the Orthodox establishment exclusive authority over religious matters.

"But it is ridiculous to define someone as a refugee because of this," said Leket, who has protested to Canadian officials the practice of granting refugee status to Israeli immigrants.

Israel, Jordan open embassies

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan officially inaugurated their respective embassies in Amman and Tel Aviv over the weekend.

At a ceremony Sunday in the Jordanian capital of Amman, officials raised the Israeli flag and installed a mezuzah at the entrance to their temporary embassy.

Israeli officials selected the Forte Grand Hotel in downtown Amman to serve as their embassy until a permanent site is chosen.

Hardly a murmur of protest was heard in the crowd, as Jordanian security men kept a few dozen demonstrators blocks away. The protesters held placards decrying the opening of the "Zionist embassy" and carried black flags.

A few hours later, a parallel opening was held in Tel Aviv for the Jordanian embassy, which will be located temporarily at the Dan Hotel.

Israel has yet to name its ambassador to Jordan but the appointment is expected by the end of the month. Until then, Ya'acov Rosen, head of the Jordanian desk at the Foreign Ministry, will oversee the embassy's operations.

On the Jordanian side, Omar Rifai, who took part in the Israeli-Jordanian peace talks and is an adviser to Jordan's Crown Prince Hassan, will head the embassy until the ambassador, Marwan Muashar, arrives.

Meanwhile, officials from both countries said serious progress was being made in talks on joint economic projects.

Among the projects being discussed is a proposed "Peace Valley" resort area in the Dead Sea region.

Syrian talks to resume

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After a 10-month hiatus, Israel and Syria will resume direct negotiations in Washington, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher confirmed over the weekend.

The decision to renew the Washington talks, which were broken off by Syria in February following the Hebron massacre, came after Christopher returned from his sixth round of shuttle diplomacy to the Middle East this year.

Christopher gave no date for the resumption of negotiations, but he described the two sides as being "extremely serious" about returning to the bargaining table.

Israeli sources, meanwhile, said that Israel, Syria and the United States are in the process of finalizing details for expanding contacts between the Israeli and Syrian ambassadors in Washington to include senior military officers, according to the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz.

The sources said military officials from both countries would join the talks "very soon" to discuss security arrangements on the Golan Heights under an Israeli-Syrian peace agreement, Ha'aretz reported.

Israel and Syria reportedly reached agreement for military officers to secretly join the Washington talks earlier this year. But after details were leaked to the Israeli media, Syria backed out, saying it would not participate in any kind of secret contacts.

On Friday, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa said Syria would not hold secret talks with Israel. He called the resumption of Washington discussions "not negotiations, but an exchange of ideas."

IDF patrol ambushed

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

HAIFA — An Israel Defence Force officer was killed and seven soldiers wounded in a Hezbollah ambush in the northern security zone on Sunday.

Four Hezbollah gunmen who carried out the ambush were killed when the soldiers charged them, despite having lost their commanding officer.

The ambush occurred while the troops, all from the Golani Brigade, were patrolling the road just three km from the border.

The Hezbollah gunmen are believed to have waited in ambush for the patrol for several hours. As the IDF troops were passing, they opened fire with anti-tank and automatic weapons.

In just over a week, two IDF soldiers have been killed and eight wounded in the northern security zone. In the same period, nine soldiers of the South Lebanon Army have been killed in separate Hezbollah attacks and several wounded.

Likud leader warns of 'explosion of terror'

The Likud leader warned of "an explosion of terror" to come, with the Middle East in danger of becoming "one big Tehran."

The current leadership under Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, he said, is steering Israel "not only toward violence and chaos but to the unravelling of the Jewish state and of Zionism."

Israel's government — like so many in the 20th century — has failed to distinguish between a real and a false peace, he said.

Netanyahu referred warmly to Jordan, where he held talks last week with King Hussein. "With Jordan, it's a real peace. They have no covenant to destroy Israel. They genuinely want peace.

"And we have the capacity to defend that peace, but only because we sit in the Jordan Valley."

He said he distrusts the intentions of both PLO leader Yasser Arafat and Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad. "We need genuine intentions and genuine defences," Netanyahu said.

"There are Arabs who want peace," he added, "but with a government that understands the Middle East as it really is."

To the responsive crowd, Netanyahu said, "I don't care what the Toronto Star says."

But the audience was advised to tune in to CBC Radio and CTV's Canada AM for interviews the following morning with the Likud leader.

The CJN was unable to secure an interview with Netanyahu.

Other speakers were Yechiel Leiter, director of Yesha's foreign desk, and Vickie Berglass, the former rebbetzin at Toronto's Shaarei Tefilah Congregation, now a resident of the West Bank settlement of Neve Aliza.

Both offered reasons the Diaspora should continue to help fund the settlements.

Cantor Yehuda Rottner of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Congregation chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim for Jewish victims of terror, while Yesha supporter Alex Raab lit a single memorial candle.

Greetings were brought on behalf of Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and Dror Zeigerman, Israel's consul general to western Canada.

Rabin, Peres, Arafat get awards

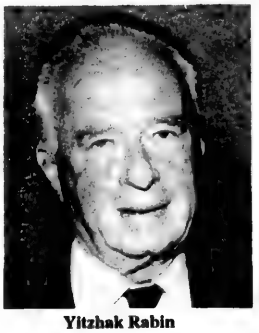
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

OSLO — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat became Nobel Peace Prize laureates on Saturday night, each expressing hope that the Israel-PLO accord would bring an end to the suffering of both peoples.

The three were scheduled to meet late on Saturday night in a bid to resolve the stalemate over implementing the next phase of the Cairo Agreement. The impasse was a reminder to all that much peacemaking still lies ahead.

Outside Oslo City Hall, where the award ceremony took place, about 150 Israelis and American Jewish protesters, including relatives of terror victims, decried the awarding of the prize to Arafat and the fact that Rabin and Peres did not boycott the ceremony.

In conferring the prize upon the three, Francis Sejersted, the chairman of the Norwegian Nobel Committee, said the award was also intended for those who pursue peace.



Yitzhak Rabin

Shimon Peres

Yasser Arafat

"Peace has to be perpetually won. That means that every award must contain an element of entering into a process, a process with a promise of peace," he said.

"The Nobel Peace Prize is awarded both in recognition of efforts which have been made, and to encourage still further efforts," he added. "There can be no doubt that this is also how Alfred Nobel intended the prize to work."

Both the awards and the subsequent speeches were given in alphabetical order to a crowd of some 1,000 invited guests, including members of Norway's monarchy and leaders of its government and parliament.

In his remarks, delivered in Arabic, Arafat said it was necessary to "accelerate the peace process and implement early withdrawal," including elections [in order for] peace to become a "deep-rooted reality." He also called for the release of Palestinian prisoners.

But in an unusual move, the PLO leader reached out to the Israeli public in a way he did not at last year's White House ceremony at which the Oslo accord was signed.

He said peace will allow "Arab consciousness" a "deep understanding [of] the European Jewish tragedy," and expressed hope that Jews will also understand how Palestinians have suffered.

Saying the suffering of Jews had creating a "tortured Jewish soul," he added, "no one is capable of understanding torture more than the tortured."

He declared that peace would create "neighborly relations, mutual respect, and cooperation with the Israeli people who, in return, would be enabled by peace to articulate their Middle Eastern identity by open economy and cultural exchange with its Arab neighbors."

In an equally rare statement, he declared that he hoped the Arabs of the region would create a "prosperous, democratic multi-party system."

Meanwhile, in his signature style, Peres expounded upon his hopes for a transformed Middle East, which he said he hoped would be "like Scandanavia."

Peres spoke about his youth at Kibbutz Alumot. "Today, as in my youth, I carry dreams; that the future of the Jewish people and the futures of the Middle East ... continue to plow the historical Jewish furrow in the field of the human spirit; that Israel will become the centre of our heritage, not merely a homeland for our people; that the Jewish people will be inspired by others but at the same time be to them a source of inspiration.

"The message of the Jewish people to mankind is that faith and moral vision can triumph over all adversity," Peres declared.

Rabin also reflected on his life experience, focusing on a theme of war and bereavement that has become a standard part of his oratory, the way former Prime Minister Menachem Begin would conjure up the Holocaust.

The prime minister spoke of the immense weight placed upon leaders like himself, who have to decide whether to embark upon a war, with all its human consequences.

Leaders must be guided by the "sanctity of life," Rabin said.

"As a military man, as a commander, as a minister of defence, I ordered to carry out many military operations. And together with the joy of victory and grief of bereavement, I shall always remember the moment just after taking such decisions, the hush as senior officers or cabinet ministers slowly rise from their seats; the sight of their receding backs; the sound of the closing door; and then the silence, in which I remain alone."

A comprehensive look at law

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What are the rights of students, parents, teachers and administrators in our educational system?

A recently published book, Education Law, by Marvin Zuker and Anthony Brown (Carswell Thomson Professional Publishing), answers this question and many more.

It is a comprehensive education law text written for educators, lawyers, parents and even students explaining their rights and responsibilities.

"The impact of the Charter [of Human Rights] on education has been enormous, including issues about minority language education, mandatory religious education, special education and students' rights," Zuker said.

"In a private or public school, staff members confront school violence, discipline, harassment, AIDS, lawsuits, family breakdown, troubled children, emergencies, the conduct of teachers and academic freedom."

Marvin Zuker

This up-to-date reference book includes sections on dress code, free speech and Pupils and the Law.

Zuker is an Ontario family court judge and executive member of the education law committee of the Canadian Bar Association (Ontario). He teaches education law at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and is also author of The Legal Context of Education.

Zuker has lectured to employees and teachers of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education and the annual February Conference of Private Schools.

Brown is a legal counsel for the Ontario Ministry of Education and Training. He has written and lectured widely in the field and is the author of Legal Handbook for School Administrators.

The Secret War Against The Jews: How Western Espionage betrayed the Jewish People, by John Loftus & Mark Aarons (McClelland & Stewart, $37.99).

This is an extraordinary book — even if only a portion of it is true. The authors, former American Justice Department Nazi hunter Loftus and Australian journalist Aarons, are convinced that the most powerful Western nations — especially the United States and Great Britain over the past 70 years — secretly planned to thwart the creation of Israel, and then its secure existence. Their undeviating aims were to protect oil and multinational profits and oppose the growth of the Soviet Union at every turn — goals which the existence of Israel often jeopardized.

The authors write, "We present a shameful history of racism, greed, and secret betrayal that is so sickening that it will be difficult for many Western readers to accept. On the other hand, our evidence is particularly hard to ignore."

The scope and range of this massive book is so enormous that a brief review can mention only a number of its revelations.

Nelson Rockefeller and his family, the authors make clear, shipped oil to the Nazis throughout the war and their pro-Nazi behavior was horrendous. As secretary of state for Latin American Affairs, Nelson Rockefeller had virtual control over the economy and political affairs of many of the South and Central American countries.

When the United Nations General Assembly in 1947 prepared to vote on the resolution recommending the partition of Palestine, David ben Gurion blackmailed Rockefeller. He informed him that a full dossier on his Nazi activities would be made public unless he influenced the Latin American countries to vote for partition. Rockefeller agreed and every single member of the Latin American bloc either voted for Israel or abstained.

In return, Rockefeller insisted that Jews would have to keep their mouths shut about the flow of Nazi money and fugitives to South America which he had made possible. With the fate of the Jewish state hanging in the balance, Ben Gurion had no alternative but to assent.

"Rosters of fugitive Nazis were quietly buried in the Israeli intelligence archives. Plans for presenting evidence at ongoing war crimes trails were shelved. For the next 12 years while Ben Gurion was either prime minister or defence minister, Israel never published a wanted list, never extradited a Nazi, never held a war crimes trial."

During the Six Day War in 1967, the Israeli air force and navy attacked the USS Liberty, one of the most sophisticated spy ships in the world, which was anchored off the Sinai coast. What was it doing there?

The authors are sure that it was cooperating with the British Secret Service and its electronic listening post in Cyprus in preparing a war map for Egypt that would detail the positions of all Israeli military forces. "With the Liberty's assistance, the Arabs might have been able to turn the war around to some extent or at least force an honorable stalemate."

When both sides were bloody enough the United States and Britain would step in as the peacemakers. The oil would flow and, of course, the impertinent Israelis would have to give back Jerusalem to King Hussein.

The hero of the Yom Kippur war, we learn, was the White House Chief of Staff Alexander Haig, who saved Israel from the inept blunders of Henry Kissinger. When Israel's military situation was desperate, Haig, without authorization, provided Israel with 4,000 TOW missiles which were able to destroy a moving tank three kilometres away. "The kill ratio for the TOW was 97 per cent."

The opening of the final Egyptian assault on Israel turned into a rout as the Arab tank force was cut to ribbons.

Of course, many of the book's findings are based on "confidential evidence" and although there are copious notes, hard facts are not always forthcoming. It is continually fascinating, often rings true, but one wonders, if so many powerful forces were arrayed against Israel, why is the State still alive, vigorous and flourishing?

Practise makes perfect music

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Stanley Solomon, retired Toronto Symphony principal violist, kvells with understandable pride as he sits with his daughter Maribeth and son Lenny in Maribeth's large front room, the sun glancing off the grand piano in the corner.

He knows he is head of a remarkable musical dynasty.

In a way, it began with his father Nochem who at one time played clarinet in the Queen's Own Rifles Band and exhorted Stanley to "practise, practise, practise!"

When Maribeth and Lenny were growing up, music was simply a way of life. At home they "took bookings" over the phone for their father (their mother had died when they were quite young). Both studied piano, with Lenny going on to violin and Maribeth to flute.

Maribeth remembers: "We used to hang out at rehearsals in Massey Hall. We'd play among the instruments and talk to the musicians."

Bubbie Ritz, their maternal grandmother, a dynamo who lived with them, boosted their every effort. She was the backbone of the family and, according to her son-in-law, the best person for them at the time.

Today, Lenny, a Juno award winner, is a top jazz violinist and Maribeth a celebrated composer/arranger.

The music that binds them also fosters individual expression. "We mould it to ourselves," says Lenny.

Stanley is the classicist. In his "retirement" he plays with the Hamilton Philharmonic and various community orchestras. Yet he encouraged Lenny's exploration of rock and jazz. He'd haunt "every dive" where Myles (Cohen) and Lenny appeared as a duo in the early years, Maribeth says.

"I would have given up if I hadn't realized that I could play popular music on the violin," Lenny adds.

Last month he was soloist in a Toronto Symphony pops concert series at Roy Thomson Hall, earning standing ovations and drawing offers from across North America. The Lenny Solomon Quintet performs at the Markham Theatre Dec. 22 and April 5, 1995, Lenny will be featured with Ofra Harnoy, Paul Kowarsky and Marc Dubois in a special benefit concert for Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital at the Four Seasons Inn on the Park.

Maribeth moves in a different direction. In partnership with her ex-husband Micky Erbe, she composes, arranges and produces music for film and television. They worked together on TV's Street Legal and ENG, and are enthusiastic about their new show, Side Effects.

Another major project for them is the IMAX film, Destiny in Space, currently at Ontario Place and their 3D IMAX film Into the Deep, which opened recently in New York.

A Billy Wilder Classic Revisited: An unstoppable juggernaut, the promotional campaign has begun for Livent Inc.'s production of Sunset Boulevard, the Andrew Lloyd Webber musical that is expected to generate some $5 million in advance group ticket sales by year's end, 10 months before its slated opening at North York's Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

Lloyd Webber, the 46-year-old British composer of Cats, Evita and Phantom of the Opera, first saw American writer-director Billy Wilder's sardonic 1950 cinematic classic Sunset Boulevard two decades ago, and has worked for much of the time since then to adapt the story to the stage.

Despite mixed reviews by critics, Sunset Boulevard has been a hit at the Adelphi Theatre in London, where the show premiered in 1993. It was later a hit in Los Angeles, and has generated unprecedented advance ticket sales of $37.5 million (US) in New York, where it opened last month, again to mixed critical reception.

The film tells the story of Joe Gillis (played by William Holden), a young down-and-out Hollywood scriptwriter who, chased by repo men, evades them by driving his car into the vacant garage of a magnificent Sunset Boulevard mansion. Invited inside, he meets Norma Desmond (Gloria Swanson), a reclusive, aging silent-film star and her reverential butler Max (Erich von Stroheim). Desperate to return before the cameras, Desmond pays Gillis to move in, doctor a script, and provide other services as well. Their relationship ends in tragedy.

Lloyd Webber's musical has followed Wilder's storyline with fidelity — perhaps too much fidelity, according to some observers. "In the beginning, I was afraid they'd completely reverse the whole thing," Wilder, 88, told the New York Times from Beverley Hills last winter. "But they didn't. In fact, I told them maybe they stuck too close to the screenplay. Maybe they should have moved a little farther away from it."

Still, Wilder, whose other films have included Double Indemnity (1944), Some Like It Hot (1959) and The Apartment (1960), claimed that he was "delighted" with the Los Angeles production. This reporter, however, having recently seen the play in London, had a more mixed reaction.

Glenn Close and Alan Campbell in a scene from the New York production of Sunset Boulevard.

Yes, large chunks of it are entertaining. Yes, parts of Lloyd Webber's score are haunting and memorable, more mature than his usual throw-away pop strains. Yes, the set is an awesome neo-Gothic vision. And yes, at least one of the three leads was beguilingly good — understudy Alisa Endsley, whose on-stage resemblance to Gloria Swanson is more than passing.

But much of Wilder's wonderful subtlety and sophistication is lost in the translation from screen to stage. For instance, in the movie, a salesclerk in a menswear store whispers to Gillis that he shouldn't be too fussy because, after all, the lady's paying. In the musical, this is expanded into a full-blown, schlocky musical number, The Lady's Paying. And how keen should audiences be to listen to a deluded, suicidal Hollywood has-been who celebrates her most secret pain in song?

Wilder's dark film about Hollywood was a perfect marriage between its subject matter and the medium in which it was delivered. It was a literate, subtle and brooding tour de force. Alas, the story doesn't work nearly as well as an overblown theatrical musical. Lloyd Webber's approach, shared by director Trevor Nunn (who also staged Les Miserables), is to turn subtext into text, and to turn text into larger-than-life pop icons — such as Norma Desmond herself. As is the case in much modern commercial theatre, the grand spectacle is emphasized, as though today's mass audiences are unable to see things of ordinary size plainly.

As in other cities, audiences will likely rush to pay (up to $93 per seat) to see Sunset Boulevard in Toronto, where it will likely play to packed houses. No doubt Livent impresario Garth Drabinsky, recently dubbed "the Ziegfeld of Canada" by the New York media, will do wonders to improve the show before previews begin here Oct. 5. (Opens Oct. 15.)

'Salt-beef' found in London

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

LONDON — Several days after consuming a reasonably good kosher corned beef sandwich in France — at Goldenberg's, 69, avenue de Wagram, Paris — this reporter found himself on Whitechapel High Street in the east end of London, below a neon sign advertising Bloom's kosher delicatessen.

The journalistic temptation was too great. A moment later, he was seated at a table, deliberating over heimishe barley soup, roast chicken leg, worsht & eggs, and "gedempte meatballs."

After outgrowing a series of premises in Brick Lane and Wentworth Street, the last of which was destroyed in the Blitz, Bloom's opened its famous Whitechapel location more than 40 years ago.

The establishment's legendary success is celebrated in a rousing essay on the back of its menu, which speaks of skilled chefs conducting kosher food experiments, the discovery of a new and tastier method of pickling their beef which "so stimulated the appetites of the people that they came from miles around," ever-growing public demand, and continuous commercial expansion from the 1920s onward.

In lieu of a bronze plaque, a large sign on the wall announces that Bloom's is the birthplace of "salt-beef" — what North Americans know as corned beef. As the menu chronicles with an historian's flair, the late kosher connoisseur Morris Bloom developed the original "Veal Vienna" (could this be the famed Wiener Schnitzel?) back in the 1920s, then scored again with salt beef. It was only a matter of time until, as the menu declares, "Bloom's salt beef sandwich became a household word."

So, given all this, what was this CJN reporter going to order — lockshen kugel? The restaurant,

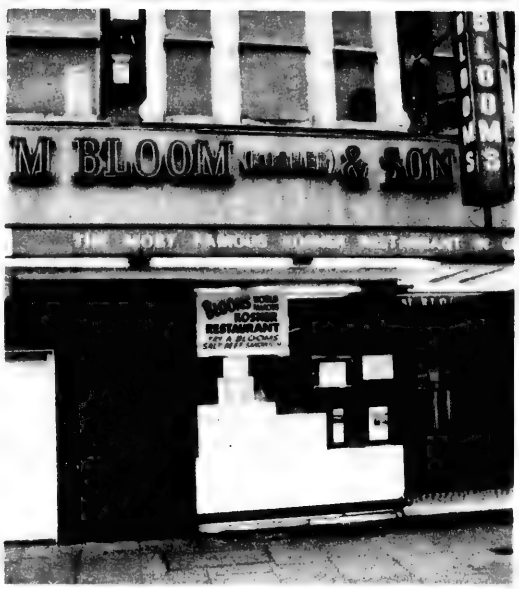
Features a take-out counter whose rather mundane decor belies its importance to Jewish gastronomic history, features a take-out counter at the front where salt-beef sandwiches are prepared. Yours truly went there and placed an order for the house specialty to go.



The front of Bloom's restaurant in London.

Cooked tender and lean

The meat is cooked tender and lean and sliced thickly by hand, across the grain, so it seems ready to fall apart. The bread is suitably crusty. Overall, the sandwich melts exquisitely 'twixt tongue and palate. Equal in taste to its Parisian counterpart, a sandwich from Bloom's stands about half as high as one from Goldenberg's, but goes for only about one-third the price: $8.

Bloom's Kosher Restaurant, 90 Whitechapel High Street, E.1, London, 247-6001. Reservations not required. A newer location is situated at 130 Golders Green Rd., N.W.11, London, 455-1338. A variety of canned kosher foods prepared by Bloom's under daily rabbinical supervision is available at some 700 outlets across Great Britain.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

On a recent Sunday morning, I emerged from the Paris Metro at La Bastille to find myself in the midst of a somewhat vociferous political demonstration of perhaps 5,000 people.

Fortunately, these protestors seemed far gentler than their historic predecessors, who stormed the Bastille prison on this spot in 1789, thus sparking the French Revolution. (No trace of the Bastille remains.) These orderly marchers were protesting against cutbacks to the educational system, against the expulsion of foreigners, and in support of other liberal causes.

I had chosen that morning for a walking tour of the historic district of Le Marais, one of the oldest sections of Paris. If these crowds wanted to accompany me along the rue St. Antoine, singing songs and chanting slogans, well, that was okay by me.

Situated in the city's third and fourth arrondissements, Le Marais is known for its many stately 16th- and 17th-century mansions. Among its attractions are the Hotel Carnavalet, containing a fine museum devoted to the history of Paris; the elegant Place des Vosges, the oldest square in Paris, where the former home of Victor Hugo is located; and the world's best Picasso Museum. Le Marais also contains, as I found, the colorful remnant of the former Jewish quarter around rue des Rosiers (Street of the Rosebushes).

I evaded the chanting throngs by turning down a narrow street that leads into the tranquil, picturesque Place des Vosges, a large park surrounded by a square of symmetrical brick houses with steeply-pitched roofs and dormer windows, dating from 1612. In a corner is the house that romantic author-poet Victor Hugo (1802-1885) occupied from 1832 until 1848, in which he wrote The Hunchback of Notre Dame. (Les Miserables came later.) Only about 20 minutes by foot from Notre Dame, the house is filled with original furniture, drawings, photographs, mementoes and busts. (Admittance $4.75.)

Across the square from the Hugo home is Hotel Pavillon de la Reine (The Queen's Pavilion), a cosy 55-room hotel built in 1986 to match the neighboring Louis XIII architecture. Not quite as exclusive or well-known as Le Ritz, George V or Paris Inter-Continental, and about half as expensive, Le Pavillon de la Reine is one of Paris's great secrets, a modest luxury hotel tucked away in a quiet historic square.

Some two centuries after the demise of the French aristocracy, Le Pavillon's front desk manager, Theo Castro, notes the demise of the aristocratic category of luxury travel. "Things are changing," he says. "In the old days, the wealthy would travel with 60 steamer trunks, and they would want you to unpack their bags, shine their shoes, take care of them in regal style. But that's finished. No one travels like that nowadays. Only show business people want it anymore."

The nearby Picasso Museum (5, Hotel Sale) reportedly holds the greatest collection of Picasso art works in the world, said to be worth more than $65 million. It consists of 203 paintings, 158 sculptures and many other works received by the state in lieu of inheritance taxes upon the artist's death in 1973. Admittance $9.25.

A few blocks away, the Jewish character of rue des Rosiers is immediately obvious. One sees Jewish stars adorning kosher bakeries, butchers and restaurants, as well as signs, courtesy of French Lubavitchers, announcing the imminent arrival of the Mashiach. The most famous kosher eatery in Paris is situated here — Chez Jo Goldenberg, which offers everything from beef goulash to eggplant moussaka.

Jewish travellers who start out on an afternoon of innocent sightseeing in Paris may soon find themselves confronting painful remembrances of things past. Painted in neat French characters across the windows of a smaller cafe are details of the many wartime deportations that occurred from this quarter. A plaque outside the former Jewish school remembers 165 Jewish schoolchildren who were deported to death camps by the Nazis.

A bust of Victor Hugo.

The Memorial to the Unknown Jew (41 rue des Francs-Bourgeois) consists of a crypt containing an eternal flame dedicated to the Jews who died in the Holocaust. An adjoining museum details Jewish resistance against the Nazis.

"N'oubliez pas," say the French. "Do not forget."

The front of Goldenberg's restaurant in Paris.

Kosher Jewish delicacies available in gay Paree

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

PARIS — Goldenberg's, one of the leading kosher restaurants in the French capital, serves a variety of Jewish delicacies in an informal haimishe atmosphere.

Located at 69 Avenue de Wagram, about 20 minutes by foot from the Arc de Triomphe, the restaurant is one of a chain whose other outlets are in Sofia, Bucharest, Istanbul and Odessa, where the owners originated. Appropriately, this establishment's slogan is De La Mer Noire à L'avenue de Wagram (From the Black Sea to Wagram Avenue).

The menu offers a variety of Russian, Yiddish, Turkish, Romanian, Bulgarian and traditional Jewish dishes that are, perhaps, reminiscent of the Goldenberg's long journey.

Upon entering through the cluttered doorway, visitors may be delighted (or distracted) to find that the front of the establishment is taken up by a mini-supermarket where kosher meats, salads and baked goods are available.

But the prices! One's nostalgia for a good old-fashioned North American twister may be overcome by the astonishing ransom of $2.38 requested for one, not half a dozen, of these tasty grand bagels!

Long and narrow, the restaurant is decorated with atmospheric portraits of religious Jews poring over prayerbooks and musical Jews playing the violin. What sounds like a heart-rending Romanian folk song pours soulfully from a hidden speaker.

A waiter, dressed in white cottons, seats you at a small table upon which he places one dish of horseradish and dill pickles, and another with rye bread and matzah.

So what'll it be to start? A bowl of clear chicken soup with kreplach ($13)? Russian borscht ($14)? And for the main course? A plate of "Jewish sauerkraut" for $26.60? Russian beef stew "comme chez ma grand'mere" for $22.40? Or does your conservative palate require a simple bagel with cream cheese and lox, costing $26.60?

After much deliberation, this reporter selects the luncheon special, a "New York style" corned-beef sandwich platter with cole slaw and potato salad. It features a triple-decker sandwich whose bottom slice of bread comes soaked in juices from the salads. The rye bread is textureless and thin as cardboard, but the meat is lean, sliced thinly by machine, and piled to a generous thickness. A caveat: the pot of mustard on the table is not the innocuous variety common in North America. Price: $23.

For desert, there's Romanian strudel and other selections for about $11.20 each. For the hungry, a full lunch or dinner for two — excluding the French and Israeli wines and the various schnapps used to wash down the meal — may easily exceed $100. (All prices include service.)

This restaurant is not to be confused with the equally famous establishment by the same name in Le Marais neighborhood of Paris, run by a brother of the owner of the Wagram restaurant.

Goldenberg's is under rabbinic supervision. Reservations, 4227-3479.

Grants awarded to fund study of Canadian Jews

TORONTO — Professor Syd Eisen, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies of York University, announced the award of six research grants to scholars studying Jewish life in Canada, a field of study that has, until recently, been neglected.

The recipients are senior and junior scholars, faculty at York University, or adjunct appointments to the Centre for Jewish Studies. Funding for the grants comes from a Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies at York University established in 1993 by the Ministry of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

Recipients of these awards are engaged in diverse and innovative research projects.

Professor Michael Brown's project, Canada's Jerusalem, is a study of reactions by the media, government officials, and individual writers to the conquest of Jerusalem by the British in 1917, and a comparison with reactions to the conquest of Jerusalem 50 years later by the Israel Defence Forces.

Professor Richard Menkis, of the University of British Columbia, is writing a history of Jewish education in Canada, collecting school records in print and in manuscript, together with MA and PhD dissertations.

Professor Stuart Schoenfeld's investigation focuses on Jewish public policy issues and is designed to set the research agenda on questions of continuity and educational practice, as Jews in Canada enter the 21st century.

Professor Joseph Levy is investigating the impact of sports on the formation of the cultural identity of Canadian Jews. This will entail collecting and analysing the data on the Canadian participation in the Maccabiah Games between 1950 and 1994.

Professor Esther Reiter's study of Camp Naivelt and the United Jewish People's Order explores a secular alternative to traditional Jewish life and will be the basis of a documentary film made for television.

Professor John Katz is building an archives of Canadian Jewish films, and will examine the role of Jews in developing the Canadian film industry and how Jews are portrayed in commercial and documentary films made in Canada.

Grants awarded in previous years facilitated research on topics such as the Iraqi Jewish community in Toronto (Sarah Carlen), the transmission of cultural values from grandparents to grandchildren (Rachel Schlesinger), Jewish folk music in Canada (Judith Cohen), responses to the Holocaust in Canada from 1933-93 (Irving Abella), analyses of the 1991 Census data on Jews in Canada (Leo Davids), and the community of Israelis living in Toronto (Rina Cohen).

Promoting new ventures in research is a mandate of the Centre for Jewish Studies, together with developing new courses, organizing conferences and lectures, and arranging for the exchange of scholars and students between Canada and other countries.

Kidney Cars raise funds for research

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The old car in the driveway that you don't even want to pay to have towed away may go to a very good cause.

Since the Kidney Foundation of Canada launched its Kidney Car Program late last year, donors have given over 2,000 cars to the Foundation, which received about $45 per vehicle.

The program, initially launched in the United States, involves encouraging people from across Ontario to donate unwanted vehicles, not necessarily in running condition, to the Foundation.

In return, donors have their vehicles towed away free of charge and receive an income tax receipt. Vehicles are then recycled for parts or auctioned.

Karen Jeffrey, Kidney Car Program chair says, "We were optimistic from the beginning that this fundraising initiative would be a great success. Our optimism is based on the fact that everyone benefits from the program.

She explains that the program also benefits the environment by providing a service which adheres to Ontario's strict salvage laws, ensuring that potentially hazardous parts and fluids such as oil, gas, radiator antifreeze, batteries will be disposed of in an environmentally responsible manner.

For information, call toll free 1-800-565-5511. Upon receiving an information kit, donors will be asked to provide specific vehicle information; once this data is processed, an OARA member will pick up the vehicle on behalf of the Foundation.

Funds raised from the program are used to support research into kidney disease, patient services, public education and organ donor awareness.

National Jewish leaders targeted by neo-Nazis

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An "unstable" member of the white supremacist Heritage Front advocated entering the Canadian Jewish Congress offices on Bathurst Street to "take out some people," according to a report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) released last week.

The October 1993 incident was among a number of disturbing revelations of plots against the Jewish community that were contained in a review of the Heritage Front and alleged Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) operative Grant Bristow.

The report indicates the Heritage Front aided Aryan Nations leader Terry Long to create a "hit list" of 22 Canadians, some Jewish. These people were to be targeted when the "day of the rope" - a race war - began.

The report indicates that Jewish anti-racists, including Marvin Kurz, legal counsel of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, were intimidated by Heritage Front members.

Referring to the 1993 murder plot, the report quoted an unnamed "source" who stated that "the primary target was to be Bernie Farber," director of community relations for Congress. The source, widely viewed as being Bristow, also told SIRC that Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege "was concerned about this type of plan but he was laughing about it...Droege also mentioned to the source that he would like to see a couple of high profile Jews assassinated as that would act as a deterrent to others who are constantly harassing the Heritage Front."

Bernie Farber

Marvin Kurz

Droege denies he said that.

The report goes on to state that CSIS passed the information of the plot to Metro Toronto Police. But Farber and Congress president Irving Abella told The CJN the first time they learned about it was in the SIRC report.

"It's somewhat terrifying to know that you're the subject of a murder plot," Farber said. "I'm amazed that this information was in the hands of law enforcement authorities and they did not pass it along to us."

Farber said after reading the SIRC report, he was told by Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave that the Metro Police hate crimes unit knew of the threat. "He felt that the threat was not high-risk enough to warn me" and that if they planned to carry it out, police would have prevented it.

Metro Toronto police chief William McCormack said police did not warn Farber because the man who made the threat was in jail on robbery charges.

"That's still not good enough. I would have wanted to be fully aware. Not informing us was disrespectful to the community and an improper course of action," Farber said.

"It's a terrifying prospect," Abella said."We were left to hang out and dry in the wind."

Abella said had Congress been notified it would have increased security at the Lipa Green Building. Farber said the RCMP did contact Congress at the time to say the building might be targeted for damage, but not that individuals were at risk.

SIRC, the civilian watchdog of CSIS, reviewed the spy agency's involvement with the Heritage Front in the Continued on page 4

El Al threatens to stop Canadian flights

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — According to a news report from Jerusalem, El Al has threatened to discontinue service from Canada if the Israeli Civil Aviation Authority grants permission to Canadian travel wholesaler Sunquest to operate charter flights between the two countries.

Toronto-based Sunquest Vacations Ltd., whose competitively priced, mass-market travel packages fill thousands of jets each year, applied to Israel's Civil Aviation Authority in October to run a series of weekly charter flights, via Royal Airlines' L1011 aircraft, from Toronto to Tel-Aviv for May to October, 1995.

Eddie Carroll, executive vice-president of Sunquest's European division, told The CJN Israeli officials will reach a decision soon. "They originally felt that it wasn't in their best interests to approve our application, but now the authorities are giving it one final review, and we're awaiting approval," he said.

Carroll said recent peace initiatives and agreements have greatly bolstered Israel's appeal as a tourist destination for Canadians. "The market is expanding, and it's more important than ever to give the consumer a choice of carriers," he said.

Offering more choice for tourist consumer

"You'd think the Israeli government, if it's committed to tourism, would be anxious to expand the market and encourage other airlines to fly to Israel. In most of the world, there's an open skies policy in effect right now. Israel should get in line with that, and make it easier to travel there, not more difficult."

According to Yona Nechustan, vice-president and general manager for El Al Canada, Israel's state-owned airline carried about 60 per cent – or some 24,000 – of the roughly 40,000 Canadians who travelled to Israel by air in the past five years. The others, he said, arrived via European national carriers like British Airways, Lufthansa and Air France, after stopping in Europe first.

"That's a possibility," Nechustan acknowledged, when asked whether El Al would discontinue its twice-weekly service from Toronto and Montreal if Sunquest's application is approved. "If and when that happens, we'll have to sit down and make calculations to determine if it's worthwhile to continue, and Continued on page 7

Reach Out, in Hebrew

TORONTO — Beginning this month, Bell Canada customers throughout Ontario can speak any of 17 languages when dialing the operator.

Bell operators now have 24-hour access to language assistance, at no extra charge to the customer, for long distance dialing.

Languages offered include Hebrew, Arabic, Polish, Russian, Romanian, Spanish and French.

The service is on a six-month trial, at the end of which it will be evaluated for the possibility of becoming permanent.

A Snow Slur

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg police force's hate crimes unit is investigating an anti-Semitic slur stamped into the snow recently outside an apartment building where many older Jewish couples and singles live.

The word spelled out was "Jude" (German for Jew).

The culprit "did it with his feet, so he took time to do this stupid thing," said the unit's Sgt. Ron Oliver. Police have no suspects in the case.

Filkow Elected

WINNIPEG — Ken Filkow, a lawyer and active member of Winnipeg's Jewish community, has been elected president of CASHRA, the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies. His term runs until next November.

CASHRA is the national umbrella for all provincial human rights commissions and the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

This year's CASHRA conference will be held here in June. It will mark the first time the organization will deal with issues of hate and intolerance, Filkow said.

Four Soldiers Injured

JERUSALEM — Four Israeli soldiers were wounded in three separate attacks in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip last Wednesday.

The attacks occurred despite stepped-up security against possible terrorist attacks by Palestinians observing the seventh anniversary of the founding of Hamas.

In the Gaza Strip, an Israeli soldier was stabbed and seriously wounded. Soldiers nearby shot and wounded the lone assailant.

In another incident, an Israeli army reservist was moderately hurt when he was attacked by a mob in the centre of the West Bank town of Ramallah.

The soldier was driving to his base when he took a wrong turn. Dozens of youths surrounded the vehicle, throwing rocks and iron bars.

The violence ended when a border police officer arrived on the scene.

And two soldiers were lightly wounded near the West Bank town of Tulkarm when a roadside bomb was detonated near their patrol car.

Deal With Druze

JERUSALEM — Finance Minister Avraham Shohat signed an agreement with Druze leaders last week, ending a crisis over Druze demands for more government funding.

The agreement ended a month-long conflict that at times turned violent. It also averted threats by Druze Knesset members to support no-confidence motions in the government.

Some $50 million will be added immediately to the 1995 budget for local Druze councils. Israel's 80,000 Druze citizens will also get up to $33 million in additional aid under the agreement.

Ties With Kuwait?

JERUSALEM — Kuwait has expressed interest in establishing low-level ties with Israel.

According to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, Kuwaiti officials conveyed their desire to exchange interest sections in a message sent via Egypt.

The foreign ministry here said the message represented the first time Kuwait has indicated any interest in establishing ties with Israel. No Israelis have officially visited the Gulf state, the newspaper said.

Return to the Scene

JERUSALEM — A man convicted of killing and wounding Arabs on Jerusalem's Temple Mount 12 years ago was detained by police last week when he tried to return to the scene of the crime.

Alan Goodman, a U.S. native who was sentenced to life imprisonment after killing two Palestinians and wounding nine in 1982, was nabbed by police at the entrance to the mount. He was on a three-day furlough from prison, police said.

Goodman was not carrying any weapons. He was released to complete his leave after he told police he had just gone to the site to visit.

In April 1982, Goodman sprayed the area with gunfire, saying he was trying to capture the site so he could return it to the Jewish people.

Traveling Incognito

PETRA — A group of Israeli tourists last week spotted Israel Defence Force Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak and his daughter visiting the ancient Jordanian rock city of Petra with a Jordanian officer.

They filmed Barak and the videotape was screened on Israel television news last week. Barak, in civilian clothes, was wearing a kaffiyeh, a traditional Arab headdress.

New Marrow Technique

REHOVOT — A new technique developed by researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science and Perugia University in Italy may allow leukemia patients to receive life-saving bone marrow transplants from unmatched donors.

Researchers report that by using megadoses of donor marrow and a specially adapted pre-transplant course of drug and radiation therapy, they have minimized the risk of rejection.

Of the first 17 patients in terminal stages of leukemia who were treated with the new method at an Italian clinic, six remained alive and disease-free three to 16 months later, according to a recently published report.

WORLD

Emigration Up

NEW YORK — The emigration of Jews from the former Soviet Union was up last month over October, according to the National Conference on Soviet Jewry.

The group says 7,367 Jews from the former Soviet Union arrived in Israel in November, compared to 6,855 the month before.

An additional 2,494 Jews from the former Soviet Union arrived in the United States in November, compared to 2,214 who arrived in October.

The figures bring the total number of immigrants to Israel from the former Soviet Union through November to 59,552 and some 30,000 to the United States.

A Mideast Bank?

WASHINGTON — In an effort to find new funding sources to foster peace in the Middle East, the United States has renewed its push to create a regional development bank.

Capitalizing on momentum from October's economic summit in Casablanca, the Clinton administration will invite 20 countries to Washington in early January for talks aimed at setting the framework for a Middle East Development Bank, administration officials say.

Israeli officials have avidly supported the bank as a way to show citizens throughout the Middle East the fruits of peace.

Israel Wins Status

ESSEN — The European Union (EU) has declared Israel should be granted "privileged status" in its relations with the organization's member states.

Meeting here last week for a summit conference, the leaders of the unions 12 member states said Israel should be given the status "because of its high level of economic development."

The decision "will profit the general economic development of the Middle East," the EU said in a statement.

Israel and the EU are currently negotiating a final accord that will enable the Jewish state to be associated with the EU's research and development programs.

HEBREW BASIC BURIAL

Beginning January 1995, Jewish families will be able to arrange economical yet dignified interment through HEBREW BASIC BURIAL. Traditional Halachic standards are strictly observed. This new alternative caters to families who are comfortable with a traditional graveside service and a more involved role in order to reduce expenses.

HEBREW BASIC BURIAL is the only all-Jewish facility in Metropolitan Toronto which provides this adherence to Halacha and attention to detail at exceptionally low cost.

Canada lags in research with Israel: Prichard

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada lags behind the United States, Europe and the United Kingdom in university-level collaboration with Israel, the president of the University of Toronto has said.

Robert Prichard urged a recent luncheon of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University to encourage provincial and federal politicians to address that "major hole" in the relationship between Canada and Israel.

Prichard and Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella met last week with Peter Barnes, Ontario's deputy minister of industry, to discuss a joint research program between Ontario universities and their Israeli counterparts.

The program would be modeled on a Singapore-Ontario project, Abella told The CJN, adding that he is "very optimistic."

Prichard was one of 17 Canadian university presidents who spent one week earlier this year touring Israel with Congress (CJN, July 28). Included in the tour were Israel's seven universities and meetings with their presidents. There was also a visit to Bethlehem University.

Prichard was struck by the "amazingly similar" issues, including budget reductions, facing Israeli and Canadian universities. He noted the high standards of the "ambitious, energetic, research-oriented" Israeli universities, but said it is difficult for Israeli researchers to collaborate with Canadians because of the dearth of federal funds for such partnerships with Israel.

"We have far too few Israeli graduate students coming to Canada, and Israelis are not recruiting Canadian-trained people. We have to get Canada as a destination for graduate students," he said.

Prichard asked said his audience should do whatever they could to support Ben-Gurion and other universities. "You've got more than money to give. You've got moral support, encouragement and spirit."

Robert Prichard

Prichard briefly addressed university funding in Canada. A proposed 75 per cent reduction in federal transfer payments would have "potentially disastrous consequences for higher education in Canada. The real question for us is where we compromise."

The luncheon, held at the downtown offices of Orenstein and Partners, marked the beginning of the Israeli university's 25th anniversary year. Paul Jacobs, president of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Associates of BGU, introduced and thanked the speaker.

Hamilton JCC gets reprieve from cash flow problems

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — A written accord signed Nov. 24 by board members of the Hamilton Jewish Federation and the Hamilton Jewish Community Centre (JCC) provides a new lease on life for the problem-plagued JCC — at least, for the time being.

One of the JCC's biggest problems has been cash flow. Since the JCC is funded in part by the federation, the latter will, under the accord, continue its monthly allocation to the JCC for the balance of the fiscal year. It will then review the centre's proposed budget.

The federation will also have access to the JCC's financial records and warns that it will not make up any deficits.

Rumors of the impending demise of the JCC — established in 1890 and thought to be the oldest Jewish community centre in Canada — had been circulating for months.

Events came to a head last summer when, as outgoing JCC president David Loewith told The CJN, the federation issued a "wake-up call" to alert the JCC board "to the gravity of the situation."

To help resolve the problems, a study was undertaken by Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the Vancouver Jewish Federation.

Then, following a series of meetings between the two boards, the agreement was signed, based on Staffenberg's recommendations, and the federation issued a statement.

In a note released with the statement, the federation president David Steinberg said "the document constitutes a general operational framework for the immediate future of the centre," as provided for in the understanding reached by the two groups.

In addition to addressing the financial difficulties, the statement says greater efforts must be made to obtain zoning changes needed "for the best possible land use," especially for recreational programs, and to extend the local bus route to the property.

Lack of public transportation is seen by many as a real obstacle to the full use of the JCC.

The federation statement also says the JCC should strive to increase membership and encourage greater use of the building.

Incoming president Harvey Waxman agreed that membership must be increased. "Basically, we need more Jewish feet going through the building," he said.

Loewith said, "Ideally, we should have a membership of 450 to 500 family units. Right now, we have only 320 units."

That means operating with a skeleton staff and keeping expenses to a minimum, he said, resulting in the "proverbial catch 22 situation: you'd like to provide [more programming] for more people but you don't have the staff to do it."

Loewith said the cash flow problem is largely due to outstanding pledges to the capital building fund, made when the JCC moved to the 34-acre location in 1987.

Compounding these problems still further are the stalled zoning negotiations.

Loewith said the town of Ancaster, where the JCC is located, would not only "endorse us, they'd be happy to have us."

But although the JCC has discussed "all the issues, such as noise, traffic, water usage" with them, Loewith said, they will not support the zoning changes.

Both Loewith and Waxman are determined to make the JCC work, "make do with what we have at the moment," and most of all, Waxman said, "get across to the community what we are trying to do."

Steinberg said the lack of success so far at the JCC "does not necessarily mean that we ought to give up on it."

If the JCC is to prosper, he said, "it can only do so if the Jewish community is behind it."

Bone marrow clinic being planned for Israeli woman

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The search for a compatible bone marrow donor for 28-year-old Israeli woman Lior Novick is gaining momentum, even in Toronto.

A mass blood screening clinic will be held at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, 2 Simonston Blvd. in Thornhill on Jan. 8, from noon until 6 p.m.

Because of the shortage of funds, those coming to the clinic will be asked to pay for their test. The $50 may be paid by cash, VISA or Mastercard.

Novick's doctors at Hadassah Hospital Ein Keren point out that the best chance for a donor rests in those of the same ethnic background as the person in need, in Novick's case Lithuanian Jewish.

However, everyone in good health, between the ages of 17 and 50, is encouraged to come out and be tested.

A simple blood test is all that is required. If you are found to be compatible, a bone marrow donation is conducted under local or general anesthetic, and you are up and around in a day or two.

Any pain can be controlled by regular analgesic medications.

Results of this screening will be shared with international bone marrow registries.

Funds to pay for future tests are also needed. Canadian tax deductible receipts will be given through Canadian Association for Labor Israel, Attention: Gert Weinberg, 272 Codsell Ave., Downsview, Ont. M3H 3X2.

Lior Novick

Novick was diagnosed with myelodysplastic syndrome, a serious malfunction of the bone marrow, in March of this year.

Drug therapy has been unsuccessful, and she must receive two blood transfusions every three weeks.

Jay Feinberg, Allison Atlas, Elizabeth Lue, "Cathy," now Mark Hart and Lior Novick. The list of those who need the community's help goes on.

Some bone marrow donor campaigns have used the slogan from the Talmud "He who saves one life it is as if he saved the whole world." Others have noted "Kol yisroel areivim zeh bazeh," All Israel is responsible one for the other.

This is Toronto's chance to again prove that we have taken those injunctions to heart.

Vancouver Jewish families moving to outlying areas

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — As the Jewish population of Greater Vancouver increases, satellite communities are expanding outside the traditional Jewish area of the city.

The newest region of development is White Rock on the Lower Mainland south of Vancouver, at the United States border.

White Rock is home to over 100 Jewish families, according to the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV).

Most of the families have combined to establish a thriving Jewish Community Centre, which also serves neighboring Surrey, a few miles north.

The Federation magazine reports that a number of families met to discuss the possibility of opening a centre after a successful community Passover seder was held.

Using the list compiled for the seder, a survey was distributed to 96 families and, said Ted Gerstl, president of the community, "we received 86 completed surveys."

In May, 50 families met; they formed three committees: children's education, adult education and social/cultural.

Since then, the centre, operating in rented premises, has boomed. After a membership drive in September, over 100 families joined as charter members.

A Sunday Hebrew school has opened with five teachers and 48 students — pre-school to age 14. The first Shabbat service was held at Sukkot, with 150 people present.

The centre is operating the school in rented space in three buildings, and uses halls for services and larger functions.

Gerstl said, "We're looking for a permanent home, but our priorities now are building a sense of community, providing good education for the kids and having interesting and meaningful social and cultural activities."

Some members come from across the border in Blaine. Washington, as well as from Bellingham and Lummi Island.

A Lubavitch centre has moved from Surrey to White Rock.

Longer established than White Rock is the Burquest community, which serves families in the eastern suburbs of Vancouver from Burnaby to Port Coquitlam and Fraser Valley.

With only 45 families, Burquest holds Shabbat and High Holy Day services, a family Chanukah party, and a Purim carnival. An adult education program is conducted by Rabbi Yosef Wosk.

Older children attend Hebrew school; young ones enjoy a newly-formed pre-school. Bar/bat mitzvah lessons are offered under Susan Katz, and the first bar mitzvah in a decade was held there recently.

The community currently shares space with a local church, but community president Mark Winston said, "Members are yearning for a place of their own where they can put up a mezuzah and tack the children's drawings on a wall.

Burquest Jewish Community Association needs a long term loan of a Torah, Winston said. Any congregations which may have one can call him at (604) 526-7235.

Both Burquest and White Rock/Surrey are served by the JFGV and the small communities division of the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region.

Neo-Nazis target Jewish leaders

wake of a Toronto Sun expose which revealed that Bristow allegedly had helped set up and finance the racist organization and had pushed a harassment campaign against anti-racists.

"The Church of the Creator (another extremist group), Droege and the skinheads all believed, said the source, that Farber was the major enemy of the Heritage Front and he was certainly the most reviled of all their 'enemies'. There was a major effort to find Farber's residence, but the source did not help and the Heritage Front never succeeded," the report states.

The SIRC report indicates that Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel co-operated on many occasions with the Heritage Front. "The source stated that Zundel asked Bristow to obtain specific information about the names, work places, home addresses, telephone numbers, and profiles of prominent Jewish individuals and groups."

Zundel told Bristow he needed the information to serve legal documents but that Bristow did not believe him.

Zundel also asked for information about Meir Halevi, Canadian head of the Jewish Defence League, as well as about his children, family, his cars and business.

"The source was asked to help Zundel obtain the names and addresses of every Jewish leader from Quebec to Winnipeg.

The report indicates, however, that Jewish anti-racist leaders were targetted for harassment. Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, was subject of a telephone harassment campaign in mid-1993. In 1992, Front members circulated the unlisted telephone number and address of Michael Elterman, a "prominent Vancouver Congress leader." A large bloodstain appeared on his porch "around the time that Bristow was supposed to have met (a B.C. racist) in Vancouver." Bristow denies any knowledge of Elterman.

The report also confirms that Bristow tried to get information about the Jewish Students Network and that in April 1993, B'nai Brith lawyer Marvin Kurz, a member of the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations, was intimidated by Bristow "looming over him, implying he knew where he lived."

Farber said Congress wanted to study the report more extensively before concluding whether, on balance, the Jewish community benefitted from the infiltration of the Heritage Front. CSIS was correct in infiltrating the group, but he noted that in the past few years it had become much more sophisticated with computer links to other racist organizations and with greater sources of revenue. "Was that due to Grant Bristow?" he asked.

At a news conference following release of the report, Gray said "I think it would be open to police authorities to go out to the people involved and say, please be careful, or please accept guards or security provisions around your home. So I think the matter is covered in that way... ."

The Threat. In one instance, the CSIS Source learned of a possible threat of serious physical violence to leaders of the Jewish community on October 26, 1993. Droege confided to the Source that Barker had told him that a Heritage Front member had been planning to walk into the CJC offices at 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto and "take out some people."

It was the Source's opinion that the primary target was to be Bernie Farber. He also stated that Droege was concerned about this type of plan but he was laughing about it. The Source said he was shocked by this revelation, but he did not pursue the subject with Droege. Droege also mentioned to the Source that he would like to see a couple of high profile Jews assassinated, as that would act as a deterrent to others who are constantly harassing the Heritage Front (HF).

The member was associated with the "French Cruller" gang: Ken Barker, Phil Grech, and, peripherally, Marc Lemire (The Donut Shop Gang). An associate of the Heritage Front, the member had secretly aligned himself with the Church of Aryan Nations Jesus Christ. He had also set up a telephone line with hate messages. The Source created hurdles in the planning for violence by saying that more people were needed to carry it out, that it wasn't a good idea, that it would take a long time, and other reasons designed to dissuade the Heritage Front member.

CSIS passed the information about the Heritage Front member's plan to the Metro Toronto Police on October 29, 1993.

According to the Source, the member appeared to be unstable. Instead of attacking the CJC, he and his associates subsequently held up a donut shop and stole a small amount of money. (Excerpted from THE HERITAGE FRONT AFFAIR, Report to Solicitor General of Canada, December 9, 1994.)

Toronto UJA campaign comes to a close

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a family celebration recently when the United Jewish Appeal had its closing event at Adath Israel Synagogue. A preliminary campaign total of $32.9 million was announced.

Framed posters were given to 144 divisional chairs, while numerous awards were distributed to other canvassers. The celebratory tone was enhanced by the projection of humorous family pictures of campaign leaders.

The total of $32.9 million includes a special gift of $1 million for a skating rink at the Canada Centre in Metullah, Israel, and a $300,000 donation for a shelter for battered women to be supervised by the Jewish Family and Child Service, announced Wendy Eisen, campaign co-chair with Bob Masters.

It is possible another $6 million will be raised before the campaign officially closes, Eisen said.

"This was a tough year for the UJA because we're just pulling out of a recession, and the total raised represents unbelievable dedication by the campaign team of 2,000 vounteers," said Lawrence Bloomberg, immediate past UJA co-chair.

Dr. Chuck Gold and Carol Kassel will head up the 1996 campaign, while Marlene Axmith will be the women's campaign chair.

One of the innovations of the 1995 campaign was a frequent fundraiser contest; the winner was David C. Green, with Wendy Eisen, Barbara Bank, Scott Staiman, Bob Masters, Robert Furman, Marlene Axmith, Eric Bornstein, Peter Waxman and Rochelle Wolfond as runners-up. The frequent fundraiser lucky draw — a free seat on a UJA mission to Israel — was won by Mathew Rotenberg.

Congratulations were extended to Barbara Bank, 1995 women's chair, who announced that the women's campaign raised $4 million this year.

For distinguished service as hard-working canvassers, awards were given to Brian Levoff, Leo Goldhar, Fay Gold, Clara Tepner, David Newman, Ruth Borts, Robert Cohen, Millard Roth and Mark Grenville.

Social agencies who benefit from the UJA campaign were represented by the following: Garry Foster, Jewish Family and Child Service; David Magil, Bernard Betel Centre; Ruth Margles, Senior Care; Ron Hoffman, Reena Foundation; Dena Lubman, York University Jewish Student Federation; Joey Steiner, Toronto Board of Jewish Education; Robert Furman, JIAS; David Brown, Jewish Students Union, University of Toronto; Nathan Disenhouse, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa; Ed Segalowitz, Jewish Vocational Service.

Ottawa says no to CJC for funds for past wrongs

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Sheila Finestone

TORONTO — National Jewish organizations last week resigned themselves to Ottawa's rejection of compensation for past discrimination.

The Liberal government turned down claims from six ethnic groups, including Canadian Jewish Congress, for redress of past indignities and persecution suffered at the hands of the Canadian government.

The total value of the compensation package would have been over $400 million.

CJC sought $4 million for a memorial and archives to commemorate the 907 desperate German Jewish refugees aboard the steamship St. Louis, turned away by Canadian officials in 1939.

The ship was sent back to Germany and most of its passengers perished in the Holocaust.

"The issue is whether to attempt to address the past or to invest in the future, secretary of state for multiculturalism Sheila Finestone stated in a letter to the eight groups.

Finestone apologized for past government actions "that were at odds with our shared commitment to human justice."

But Ottawa believes "the best approach is to use limited government resources to create a more equitable society today and a better future for generations to come."

To that end, Finestone reiterated the government's promise to set up the $24 million Canadian Race Relations Foundation in Toronto.

The foundation, originally promised by the previous Conservative government, has been welcomed by Jewish groups and slammed by the Reform Party as wasteful. It will serve as a clearing house and resource centre for research and policy development on racism and discrimination.

Groups seeking redress were the National Congress of Italian Canadians; the German Canadian Congress; the Chinese Canadian National Council and the National Congress of Chinese Canadians; the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association; and the National Association of Canadians of Origins in India.

The groups were hoping to receive the same treatment as Japanese Canadians, who in 1988, received nearly $400 million for having been interned, relocated, deported or had property confiscated during World War II.

Some 18,000 affected individuals received $21,000 each, in addition to a lump sum of $24 million, half of which was returned to Ottawa to help establish the race relations foundation.

In a statement, CJC president Irving Abella said congress is "somewhat disappointed" by last week's decision but that it was "heartened with Mrs. Finestone's commitment to multiculturalism and removing the barriers that exist in Canadian society."

Congress said it is still hopeful that Ottawa will find a way to memorialize events surrounding the St. Louis.

B'nai Brith Canada "hailed" Finestone's decision in a statement. "The government has candidly and openly recognized the instances of injustice in our past and clearly stated its inclusive vision for the future. We recognize the difficult decision Mrs. Finestone and the government faced on monetary redress," said BB national president Brian Morris.

Hamilton teachers get lesson on how to teach Holocaust

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Organizers have reported a "very, very positive" response to Hamilton's first ever teachers' workshop on how to teach the Holocaust.

The workshop, sponsored by the Hamilton-Wentworth & Area Jewish Federation, was attended by over 40 public, Catholic and Jewish high school teachers.

Dennis Nash, a teacher for the hearing impaired with the Hamilton-Wentworth Roman Catholic Separate School Board, was one of the organizers. Nash has long been reading Holocaust books to Grade 5 and 6 classes, and is the board's representative on the local Holocaust education committee.

Because of "the sensitivity of the subject," Nash said, some of the teachers he spoke to wanted "a little more hands-on instruction" on how to deal with it in the classroom.

Nevertheless, he said participants praised the workshop and appreciated the presence of Holocaust survivors.

Many were moved to tears by the account of committee chair Dr. Nadia Rosa's experiences as a small child in Czechoslovakia under German occupation and subsequent incarceration in the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

Rosa's particular concern, however, is the importance of historical accuracy, especially in works of fiction.

She has "a very hard time," Rosa said, with fictional works "where the authors take liberties with historical facts."

The danger with rearranging events and facts to suit the story, she pointed out, is that it "contributes to discrediting the whole historical fact of the Holocaust and feeds ammunition to the Holocaust deniers."

Rosa implored the teachers to "learn your facts thoroughly, understand history, and never let anybody deny the Holocaust."

Rosa was preceded by Toronto education consultant Frank Dialystok, who put "emotion" and the importance of "striking the right balance" at the top of his list of considerations in teaching the Holocaust.

His advice was simply to provide the information through reading and other resources and hold discussions.

Peace Watch monitors Israel, PLO deal

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On Jan. 16, 1994, Iad Bin Hamdi Abu-Shakafa and two accomplices slipped into Israel through a break in the boundary fence surrounding the Gaza Strip.

Making their way to the town of Ramle, they found Shaul David, tailed him and seized him, Israeli authorities allege. Near the town's open air market, they smashed his head using concrete blocks, causing massive injuries and internal bleeding. Two of the attackers were eventually arrested and sentenced to 12 years in jail for attempted murder.

Abu-Shakafa escaped and took refuge in Palestinian-controlled territory. Israeli authorities have filed a request for his transfer, but the request has fallen on deaf ears. In fact, Abu-Shakafa's case is one of five involving Palestinians suspected of political crimes, who have taken refuge in areas outside Israeli control, and where Palestinian authorities have ignored transfer requests.

The case was highlighted in a recent report authored by Peace Watch, a non-partisan volunteer organization established in Israel shortly after the September 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP) to monitor compliance by Israel and the PLO with the agreements they sign.

Transfer of suspects in political crimes is required by the subsequent Gaza-Jericho Agreement initialed in Cairo, Peace Watch pointed out.

Publicizing its findings is a key tool used by Peace Watch to pressure Israel and the PLO into complying with their treaty obligations, said Dan Polisar, the organization's Brooklyn-born director.

Peace Watch was founded in the belief that "the greatest danger to the success of the [PLO-Israel] accord is the failure of compliance."

The board of directors of Peace Watch includes both opponents and supporters of the accord, but they all share the belief that once signed, its terms must be binding on both sides, Polisar said.

The organization employs seven full-time and three part-time staff who conduct research and do interviews to determine whether Israeli-Palestinian agreements have been breached.

So far Peace Watch has published reports outlining noncompliance by both sides, Polisar, 30, said.

In addition to the transfer issue, Peace Watch has brought to light Israeli violation of a free trade agreement. By banning the import of produce from Gaza (to protect Israeli farmers), Israel breached the agreement. But after the breach was publicized, Israel later complied, Polisar said.

Perhaps the most familiar noncompliance issue is the PLO's failure to alter its Covenant, which calls for the destruction of the state of Israel, he said. Instead, Arafat continues to attempt to pry more concessions from Israel in exchange for a promise to fulfil it.

That may be an example of a Mideastern mindset in which parties reach an agreement, but then continue to negotiate how to implement its terms, he said.

Peace Watch's approach is one that is more familiar to North Americans who are used to the "bourgeois, Anglo-Saxon concept" of agreements in which you do not pick and choose the terms to comply with, he said.

Peace Watch applies that methodology to both sides and "most people who've seen our reports consider us fair. We have no qualms about telling the truth wherever the chips fall.

"Overall, Palestinian compliance needs more improvement than Israeli compliance. . . but I'm not interested in who gets criticized more. I'm interested that the problems get fixed," Polisar said.

Poster vandalized at high school

TORONTO — A poster that was defaced with a statement denying the Holocaust was an isolated incident that was out of character for York Mills Collegiate, the school's principal asserted recently.

Peter Young said the poster, which was displayed during Holocaust Education Week in November, was brought to his attention by a group of students. He assured them that the school would monitor whether similar incidents occurred in the future.

"The issue is front and centre. I think it's a rare occurrence, but that doesn't mean we don't take it seriously." Young said. "This is a school that hasn't had much of a problem to date of groups not getting along with one another. Maybe, however, the times are changing a wee bit. Forty-five different nationalities are represented in our school."

Young said that in the wake of the incident, he met with department heads to discuss the issue of hate-motivated incidents and to request that staff inform him of any similar occurrences. Staff were also told what to look for in students' clothing, such as Doc Marten boots with white or red shoelaces, that might identify racists.

Young said he has not seen anyone displaying the skinhead look since he assumed the post of principal in September. And he is unaware of any racist recruitment efforts in the school. "But that doesn't mean there are no students who would be susceptible."

Young said York Mills has taken a proactive stance with regard to race relations. School assemblies have been held on the issues of diversity and fairness and an "equity education portfolio" was established several years ago, in which an equity officer examines ways of giving students knowledge of other cultures and updating the curricula to include "issues of equity."

Nadine Tobin, a Grade 13 student at York Mills, said the poster in question had advertized a speaker on the Holocaust who had been invited to York Mills by NAHON, the Jewish high school students' group.

"A lot of the [other] flyers had been ripped down" but only one was defaced with the statement that the Holocaust never happened, and last winter a swastika was carved on an exit door, she said.

Also of concern to Tobin was that "the term 'JAP' (Jewish American Princess) is used a lot in the school," even by Jewish students. — P.L.

Islamic fundamentalism called major threat

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The rapid spread of Islamic fundamentalism poses the most serious threat to international security today, said a representative of an organization which focuses on international Jewish affairs.

Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, was the guest speaker at the recent United Jewish Appeal (UJA) 1995 Major Gifts Event held at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York.

"Islamic fundamentalism is a danger engulfing the whole world," Hoenlein told the audience of 275. He said fundamentalists control the three central republics in the former Soviet Union; they have a strong presence in Africa in Somalia, the Sudan, Kenya and Algeria; and they are rapidly gaining power in Egypt.

The fundamentalists have built 3,000 mosques in Egypt and they control all the professional groups, Hoenlein said, warning that the influence of fundamentalism is spreading westward.

There are 100,000 mosques in Turkey and 1,000 in Holland; an estimated 10 million fundamentalists live in the heart of Europe, he said. "Islam is the number two religion in Belgium."

The fundamentalists have settled in North America, which has become their second largest source of funds after Iran. They claim to be raising money for social causes, but use the money for violent purposes, Hoenlein said.

"We know that many of them are coming to Canada to raise funds," he told The CJN, adding that since the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Centre in New York, law enforcement agencies are tightening up their laws in an effort to control fundamentalist activities.

The FBI and CIA are devoting more resources to combating terrorism, and a new U.S. crime bill will have stiffer penalties for anyone aiding or abetting terrorists, he said.

The major gifts givers have contributed $25 million to the 1995 campaign, which officially ends this month. Last year UJA raised $39 million, but the total contributions for 1995 have not yet been calculated.

UJA Campaign co-chairs were Wendy Eisen and Robert Masters. Michael Bregman, Lorri Kushnir and Fred A. Litwin were the Major Gift Cabinet co-chairs. Ron Frisch and Larry Tanenbaum were the Major Gift Event co-chairs.

The top major gift canvasser awards went to Lawrence Bloomberg, president and CEO of First Marathon Inc.; Dave Green; Honey Sherman, Atarah co-chair; and Scott Staiman, president of Kernels.

Chocolate Sunday in B.C.

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A chocolate replica of a Ghengis Khan artifact will be featured as part of Hadassah-WIZO's fourth annual Chocolate Sunday.

The fundraising will be launched with a kosher dinner and dance at the Empress hotel on Jan. 14.

The Chocolate Sunday exhibition runs the next day at the adjoining Victoria Conference Centre.

Stephanie Gilbert, convenor, and Lisa Edgar, coordinator, promise A Night of Musical Memories for the dinner-dance. An "authentic" ballroom dancing display will get the evening under way.

Chocolate Sundays are presented by Hadassah-WIZO chapters in several cities across the country; Victoria's has raised thousands of dollars for Hadassah-WIZO projects in Israel.

More than 35 exhibitors have signed on for Chocolate Sunday and some of the added features include talks and demonstrations by Vancouver and Victoria chefs.

Starting on Jan. 10, a group of sculptors and chefs will create — out of a ton of chocolate — a replica of a Ghengis Khan artifact, to tie in with an upcoming exhibit at the Royal Museum of British Columbia.

Admission to Chocolate Sunday is $5 which includes five samples plus a chance on a draw for a luxury cruise and other prizes. Dinner is $85 per person, partly tax deductible.

Cooperation seen key to black-Jewish relations

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The city's black and Jewish communities should avoid playing into hostile hands by fighting with each other, said a Canadian Jewish Congress official discussing relations between the two groups.

"We have the same enemies. If we fight with each other, we play into their hands," said Steve Shulman.

Shulman reported a drop in tensions in recent months and the development of positive contacts with the Black Professional and Business Society. "Don't fall prey to stereotypes," he said. "We have more in common than our differences."

Shulman, CJC associate director of community relations, was speaking at a Brotherhood breakfast of Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

"I don't believe that all blacks, or even a majority, are anti-Semitic," Shulman said. "Most blacks are hard-working members of society. There is a problem of prejudice against blacks in our own community that we have to face."

He urged synagogue members to get to know blacks on an individual basis and suggested the synagogue work together with a black group on a charitable project.

But Shulman said a lingering chill in the air caused by the debate over Show Boat was still making it difficult for the two communities to come together.

The CJC official said it was unfortunate some Jews did not appreciate the complaints the black community had against the musical. "It is not for Jews to tell another community what should offend them."

Blacks and Jews need to work together, he said, to fight extreme rightists. He included the Nation of Islam as part of a wider problem of intolerance. "We have to know what we may be in for. It makes it more urgent for blacks and Jews here to come together."

A videotape of a speech by disgraced Nation of Islam aide Khalid Abdul Muhammad full of vile anti-Semitic slurs brought gasps from the audience.

Emil Bienstock chaired the meeting, while Lew Lightstone introduced the speaker.

how to continue, and so forth."

"El Al is owned by the government of Israel, and we do what the government of Israel is telling us to do," he said.

Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, has achieved a remarkable success in getting Sunquest and other Canadian travel wholesalers to mass-market Israel as a tourist destination to the Canadian public. "We've developed a very good marketing network in Canada that didn't exist before, and we believe that we've reached the point where we can promote Israel better with more than one carrier," she said.

"In the modern world you need to provide choices to people, and you need to offer more than one product."

Sunquest's Carroll told The CJN that if its application is denied, it may reconsider whether to keep selling Israel to Canadians. "We've been very involved in promoting Israel for the past three years," he said. "But if they're going to make it more difficult for us to do our job, one wonders about promoting the destination at all."

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

PLACE NAMES (TOPONYMICS)

In the Russian Empire of the early 19th century there were a number of edicts of expulsion of Jews from different areas. At about the same time, adoption of surnames became mandatory. It was not unnatural for Jews to assume names of their former origin. This accounts for the many toponymic Jewish surnames like Pinsky and Slytzky, people who were expelled from Pinsk and Slutzk.Sometimes the name was adopted because the bearer visited rather than resided there. For example, not many Jews resided in Leipzig, but a person who visited the famous Leipzig fair might adopt the name Leipziger.

Large areas were responsible for names like Litvack (Lithuania), Litwin (Latvia or Lithuania), Pollock (Poland) and Woloshyn (Vallachia).

1995

This is the last issue of the paper in Calendar year 1994. Unlike Rosh Hashanah, the turn of the Gregorian wheel is not regarded as a religious occasion. There is no machzor to guide our prayers, nor a spiritual focus for the self-assessment so vital to meaningful human existence. The noisemaker is no substitute for the shofar, and the party hat is no replacement for the kipah, but as the days become weeks, the weeks flow into months and the pages of the calendar fall off one by one into the misty recall of our memory, it is only human nature to take note.

And what do we notice? The cynic can say, with some justification, plus ça change plus c'est la même chose: the more things change, the more they stay the same.

After all, the human condition dips and climbs through a familiar daily landscape of trying to make a living, providing food, shelter and education for one's family, helping one's neighbor, and avoiding the increasing incidence of random violence. Farther afield the terrain is still cluttered with the reminders of civilization's lost battles: disease, hunger, inter-ethnic conflict and war.

Though there was much to celebrate in Jewish life this past year, the Jewish condition is still perennially one of concern: peace and security for Israel, anti-Semitism at home and abroad, assimilation, commitment and continuity.

In noticing, therefore, the change from one year to the next, we cannot help but ask ourselves what is the proper approach in trying to deal with life's numerous and seemingly insurmountable challenges? What is the balance between Pollyanna and pessimist?

We believe that life is too important and the cause of human betterment is too precious to surrender to cynicism. The cynic provides no solutions. He becomes stuck in a self-created bog caused by a steady stream of excuses. And yet, there is so much work that must be done in so many fields of endeavor, the mere thought of it is almost overwhelming.

Rabbi Tarphon, the sage of Mishnaic times, may hold for us a piece of timely advice. He was a realist who looked with a clear and precise eye upon the ways of the world. He saw life's difficulties in all its unburnished detail; he and his people suffered greatly under the cruel, heavy boot of Rome. But he also saw life's possibilities and the individual and societal fulfilment that lay within human grasp.

His advice commends itself even today: "It is not incumbent upon us to finish the work; but neither are we free to desist from it."

Moroccan model

It was not by chance that Morocco recently hosted the first Middle East-North African Summit, a conclave of Arab and Muslim nations which saw Israel participate as a full member in the economic dialogues.

Moroccan Jews deem it natural that their capital, Casablanca, should be the meeting place of Jews and Arabs, a model to which Jews and Arabs in the Middle East could aspire.

The 8,000-strong Jewish community of Morocco, reports the Christian Science Monitor (Nov. 22), has been instrumental in encouraging closer ties between Jerusalem and Casablanca.

It has been able to do so because Jews and the majority Arab population in the country enjoy an amicable relationship, unique in the Arab world.

Jews are free to worship and to work as they please in Morocco. They attribute this to King Hassan II, who has followed the sage policies of his late father, Mohammed V, as far as minority rights are concerned.

Not only do Moroccan Jews enjoy all civil liberties, but two members of the Casablanca Jewish community occupy high positions in the Moroccan government — Serge Berdugo, minister of tourism, and Andre Azoulay, King Hassan's financial and economics adviser.

The success of Moroccan Jews in serving as a bridge between Jews and Arabs everywhere has not been lost on the huge moroccan-Jewish Diaspora in Israel, France and Canada itself.

Inspired by the experience of their Moroccan families who have effected a solid modus vivendi with the Arab population, Moroccan Jews are beginning to assert themselves in Israel and abroad as ambassadors of a new relationship that is possible between Jews and Arabs.

The optimism of this new Moroccan-Jewish coalition must be encouraged. Anything which promotes inter-community amity needs support in these troubling times for Israel.

Letters to the editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. A VISIT TO GERMANY

The State of Brandenburg of the Federal Republic of Germany, in which the concentration camps Sachsenhausen and Ravensbruck were located, is inviting surviving former inmates as its guests from April 21 and 25, 1995, to attend the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of their liberation, all expenses paid.

Application forms should be requested from Ministerpraesident des Laudes Brandenburg, Postfach 601051, 14410 Potsdam, Germany. The deadline for appliations is Jan. 30.

Consideration may be given for a companion to accompany the former inmate. The visit may be extended at the visitor's own expense.

As a registered former inmate of Sachsenhausen, I received an invitation in German with the request to pass it on to other surviving inmates of those two camps, of which there will be a number in Canada.

PRINTED IN FULL

In CJN letters Nov. 24, Rabbi Abraham Cohen questions views imputed to me, which he gleaned from a CJN report of Nov. 3.

I presume that Rabbi Cohen did not hear my actual remarks, and is reacting to the context of the written word.

It is obvious that belief in afterlife is important in Judaism. Clear statements to this effect in the Talmud are enough evidence, as is the additional rationale offered by Rabbi Cohen.

But this does not make belief in afterlife a major concern. The major concern in Judaism has always been the here-and-now. "Better is one period of repentance and good deeds in this world than all of life of the world to come" (Talmud, Avot 4:22).

Concerning the Holocaust, I have never bought into Kushnerian theology. To say that God cries does not mean that is all God does or can do. Kushner may say so, but does that mean those who speak of God crying agree with Kushner? God cried long before Kushner reported this.

I have always felt that Kushner's proposition, creating God in our own image, in an image we can fathom, smacks of intellectual idolatry.

It would have been more appropriate for Rabbi Cohen to research the matter before attributing to me views that are not mine.

PLACE OF WOMEN

It was heartening to hear Irving Nitkin's news from the midbar west of Toronto (CJN, Nov. 10).

There are Conservative Jews living and working and davening in Toronto who don't seem to suffer from femiphobia. The disheartening thing is how many of us had to leave the Conservative movement to find or create alternatives where men and women can worship equally.

After 10 years of struggling for change from within, my family decided to leave the shul that had been our home for more than 15 years. It was difficult and painful. But not as painful as facing, week after week, the fact that women did not count, that our knowledge, our commitment, our desire did not qualify us to be equal partners in religious practice.

I know many Conservative Jews in Toronto who have left Conservative synagogues over the refusal of their leadership to recognize and acknowledge the movement's stance on women. Some have moved to Reform or Reconstructionist synagogues where egalitarianism is a fact of life, not a battle. Some, my family among them, have helped to establish havurot where men and women can participate equally and publicly, and where our sons and daughters can see we value the involvement and participation of women and men.

If someone were to deliberately create an agenda to turn our children away from Judaism, Ramah Canada has shown us precisely how to do it. Take the cream of our crop, the kids who have chosen to make their lives as Jewish professionals, people who want to be actively Jewish and to express their Judaism professionally — and then subvert their accomplishments. What narishkeit!

Peace talks stumble over security and politics

By Yeshayahu Anug

According to the Oslo agreement with the PLO, now bolstered by the Nobel Prizes, election of the Palestinian Council that will administer the autonomous areas throughout the interim period are essential for the continuation of the peace process.

Israel had committed herself to redeploy its armed forces outside the populated Arab towns shortly before these elections. The PLO was to establish a "strong police force" to secure public order in the Arab community, while Israeli troops were to move freely in the surrounding areas to safeguard Jewish settlements and settlers.

Though it was clear from the outset that such complicated designs will be difficult to implement, both sides believed the very prospects of peace would produce an atmosphere of conciliation and facilitate the uneasy coexistence in the territories between settlers and the local population. This was not to be.

Opposition on both sides against the agreement became more violent and soon doubt replaced the short-lived euphoria. The massacre of Arabs in the Hebron mosque and the vicious attacks by Islamic fanatics darkened the horizons. Public support in Israel for the government wavered and in the Arab community, Yasser Arafat's position as the undisputed leader of the Palestinian cause was increasingly challenged by his Islamic rivals. During the few months since his return to Gaza, life there has become even more miserable. The influx of foreign aid is slow and limited due to mistrust of Arafat's inept administration.

Still, the peace process has now reached the crucial testing ground of the elections. Whether Arafat really wants this test, which could strengthen his Hamas enemies, is difficult to tell, but also irrelevant. The fact is that without elections the whole peace process will come to a standstill unless the agreement is radically modified.

For valid security considerations, but also for internal political reasons, Israel is now hesitating to redeploy its forces as committed. For its part, the PLO refuses to hold elections in the presence of the Israeli army, nor does it agree to its temporary withdrawal and subsequent return after the voting.

Another idea floated in Israel — to postpone the elections until a network of new bypass roads is in place in the territories — is unrealistic. Not only would such labyrinthian construction take too much time and money, it would put an end to the whole process. Talks are now aimed at finding a mutually face-saving formula.

More complex still are the uneasy contacts with Syria. In the wake of U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher's apparently inconsequential visit, a verbal truce between the parties has now replaced the sharp exchanges of recent weeks. The talks between the two delegations are to resume with the participation of high-ranking military experts, an indication that security issues could now be discussed directly. But this is just stage management, not a real breakthrough.

Meanwhile, the increased terrorist activity of Hezbollah in south Lebanon, designed to undermine the morale of the Israeli-controlled militia and to harass Israeli units in the area, has been quite successful. It is possible that Syria wants to remind the Israelis it can manipulate that front at will, until the Golan issue is settled on its terms. It could also be an Iran-inspired escalation to provoke Israeli retaliation of a scale that would torpedo the Syrian-Israeli talks, as well as the Lebanese government's intention to reach a working settlement with Israel.

Whatever the reasons for this painful flare-up in the north, a number of high ranking Israeli military staff made unauthorized and highly bellicose remarks, which induced Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to cool the tension they produced from Tokyo. He reminded the public that spectacular raids against Hezbollah had resulted in wild Islamic revenge in Israel and against Jewish targets abroad.

More than a rebuff to the military who had exceeded their mandate, Rabin's reaction was a recognition that only a political solution can change the explosive situation along Israel's northern frontier. But how can that be achieved without trying harder in the negotiations with Syria?

It was, however, a timely message to the Israeli public by a prime minister who has recognized the limits of power, but whose tactics have so far not matched his convictions. The conduct of the problematic peace processes with the PLO and Syria in the shadow of uncontrollable terror needs some serious rethinking. Meanwhile, Rabin's image as a clearminded leader was recently weakened by a number of mishaps which started as rethorical blunders.

Rabin seems overworked and tense, which is understandable given his loaded agenda, but his mood affects both the style and quality of his political decisions.

Objectively, his mid-term record is much better than it looks. He will now have to decide how to handle the peace talks with the PLO and Syria, where to be flexible and where to stiffen Israel's position. He may decide to slow down the negotiations on one or both peace-fronts. Back at home he must also put his house in order and show decisive leadership and firm direction. If he hesitates to act, he will seriously endanger his political future.

Turkish Jews struggle to maintain identity

By SUZANNE R. KATZ
Special to The CJN

In April 1986, the joy of a synagogue's rededication was brutally shattered by terrorist explosives, leaving 23 dead and dozens wounded.

The bombing of Istanbul's Neve Shalom Synagogue was a watershed event for Jews the world over, making real the possibility of unprovoked attack in a traditionally tolerant environment.

Immediately, parallels were drawn between the Turkish and North American communities. Both are well-off socially and economically, and have adapted to non-Jewish surroundings with characteristically Jewish flair.

For the first time in American and Turkish communities, security measures were instituted as a precaution in synagogues and schools. The threat of Jewish community dissolution momentarily shifted from the intangibles of assimilation, ignorance and apathy to the physical.

Today, the focus has returned to the daily trials that wrest with the soul of the Jewish community: how to sustain traditions in a changing world, to educate without pedantry, to encourage and not to alienate. What follows are some of the concerns with which Turkish Jewry struggles, and some of the inspiring solutions that preserve its 500-year-old heritage, originating in Spain.

Following the expulsion from Spain in 1492, more than 120,000 Jews were welcomed into the Ottoman Empire by Sultan Beyazit II. Today, the entire Jewish population of Turkey numbers only 23,000. Istanbul has approximately 20,000 Jews, with 18 synagogues, a few kosher butchers, a Jewish home for the aged, two Jewish schools, a Jewish hospital, and numerous Jewish social organizations.

Chacham Bashi David Asseo is the chief rabbi of Turkey, and Chacham Izak Haleva is the chief rabbi of Istanbul. Their power is highly centralized. There are no denominational divisions among Turkey's Jews; all halachic decisions are determined by a Beit Din and other community matters are decided by a Jewish Community Council.

This centralized structure paradoxically engenders closeness between the community and its leaders.

"We follow the Orthodox laws, but Turkish style," says Chacham Haleva. For example, most Istanbul Jews drive to synagogue on Shabbat, an act Chacham Haleva cannot officially sanction. He looks the other way, because "it is better that they drive to synagogue and experience Judaism, than they stay home on Shabbat and don't do anything Jewish at all."

This practical approach also applies to the Jewish "clubs", Jewish community-owned buildings where teenagers socialize — primarily on Shabbat. They play music, use lights, and otherwise defy tenents of traditional Sabbath observance. Community leaders only weakly object, in deference to the clubs' obvious value in forestalling assimilation and intermarriage.

About 500 miles south of Istanbul is Izmir, Turkey's other main locus of Jewish concentration. Here, the risks of assimilation and intermarriage are magnified by the relatively small community of about 3,000. Many young people travel to Istanbul, Israel or Europe for higher education and return to Izmir only to visit their parents and see old friends, not to begin their lives.

In the face of entrenched community leadership and the seldom voiced but pervading opinion that the community is dying, one woman determined to reverse the downward trend. Four years ago, Gizel Hasan rallied the Jewish Community Board to donate money for the Liga, a Jewish singles club and general meeting place. She was concerned about the gradual attrition of the community, primarily through assimilation and intermarriage.

"We have 130 young unmarried men between the ages of 18 and 40, and 70 women in this category," Hasan says.

Hasan says many of the directors of the community board are in their 70s, and think the community will die in 100 years. "Some have children who are married to Muslims, and don't want to view [intermarriage] as a problem."

Yet there is an upsurge in traditional practices in Izmir among the young. Jewish wedding baskets, foods and the Liga are indications, according to professional tour guide Sara Pardo, that people know "that something's slipping out of our hands, and we have to grab it, tightly."

Hasan has organized social weekends between the Istanbul and Izmir communities, as well as the Ininiyet (Goodwill) group. On significant life-cycle occasions, Ininiyet sends a packet of biscochos (cookies) and sweets on glass plates emblazoned with their logo.

For many of Istanbul's Jews, a meaningful connecting with tradition is hampered by the lack of the essentials of ritual observance. Hebrew illiteracy is widespread, primarily among the women, and the structure of synagogue rites and practices leaves little room for self-reflective inquiry. While most Turkish Jews strongly identify with their heritage, they attend synagogue only on the High Holidays, or for a wedding or bar mitzvah.

Perhaps the most concrete expression of Turkish Jewry's yearning for connectivity and continuity is the Our Roots project funded by the Grand Rabbinate. It aims to trace the genealogical histories of all Turkish Jews, both in Turkey and abroad.

"You can tell someone's family background by the traditional foods they eat," says Leyla Ipecker, who runs the Our Roots project. For her Seder table, she lays out an enticing array of salads, fish and mina (matzah and spinach, matzah and meat).

"It's for the children," she explains. "We've forgotten so much valuable information because it's not written down."

Rasky's Prophecy — a special experience

An old definition of a prophet goes like this: Prophets are people who tell us what ought to be, not what will be.

Renowned filmmaker and Emmy winner Harry Rasky has created something very special, a film called Prophecy. It is a kind of spiritual travelogue that touches many religions and, in a rather unique way, focuses on Judaism and Jerusalem. It is a universal film, but it is also very Jewish.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Rasky, a native Torontonian, is fascinated with religion. He tells how as a child living in narrow quarters on Mackay Street in downtown Toronto, he heard his father's chanting and how the words impressed themselves forever in his mind. Being Jewish is something very serious for him, and I've seen him in shul often enough to know it.

His Judaism is touched by the prophetic, for he has absorbed both the intense love of an Isaiah for his own people as well as his universalist vision embracing others as God-seekers. In a way his film is an illustration of the rabbinic saying, "The righteous of all nations have a place in the world to come," translated into ordinary English as "you don't have to be Jewish to be religious."

The film is an exploration of modern prophecy not in the sense of our tradition, which says prophecy ceased with Malachi, but through people's responsibility for each other and for our planet.

Rasky is a fundamental ecologist who, with many others, believes we are on the wrong road, that we have misused God's great gift to us and have exploited rather than respected it. Not surprisingly, he is greatly taken with the native peoples' love and respect for Mother Earth and believes we can learn from them.

Throughout the film, aboriginal images and songs dot the verbal and musical landscape. The cinematography is splendid. You are enveloped by nature, by cities, by masses of people on all continents. You hear languages from every part of the world. You meet the Dalai Lama, Bahais, Christians and Jews who share his concerns.

It all starts off with an interview with Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum of Toronto, who died not long ago. He was a survivor of the Japanese war prisoners' camp at the River Kwai. He relates how, with all the cruelty and depravation he experienced, he always let hope be his ladder upwards. I forget his exact words, but I do remember his face, with its lovely, benign smile and twinkling eyes. He spoke of Judaism as a very special pursuit of ultimate goals and did so in down-to-earth language.

Rabbi Nussbaum begins and ends the film, and in a way the whole parade of observations, images and personalities is framed by the Jewish view. At the centre of it all stands the city of Jerusalem.

Rasky has a love affair with the City of God, and time and again he returns to it both personally and in the film. Yet, this is not a tourist movie showing you great highlights; rather, Jerusalem becomes the thread that runs through the film.

At 2 hours and 15 minutes, it is a long picture. As a critic I would say it could be shorter without losing any of its punch, but the large audience at the Ontario Science Centre (assembled there by the Jerusalem Foundation, which sponsored the premier) sat entranced in silence. Afterwards, when we had a chance to speak with each other, we agreed the evening had been a kind of religious experience.

Critics will cavil with this or that, but the rapt attention, the utter quiet, the meditative calm that enveloped the audience spoke loudly in their very silence.

When it comes your way, be sure to see Prophecy. It shows no violence, no sex and its love story features the human soul in search. There's no prophetic thunder. There is, however, prophetic warning.

There's more to Maccabees than people realize

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD

This is a non-rabbinic response to Rabbi Elyse M. Goldstein's rabbinic reflections on Chanukah (CJN, Nov. 24). She cannot really pass herself off as a "Chanukah Scrooge" because she is surely not a "mean-spirited" person in the definition of Charles Dickens' famous Christmas character. But I am afraid she is somewhat wrong-spirited about the significance of Chanukah.

One cannot quarrel with her concern over the tendency to equate Chanukah with Christmas at the commercial level. But one can quarrel with her claim that Chanukah is a lesser of "our real holy days." If "the Torah knows nothing of Chanukah" it is only because the early rabbis willed it so. To determine what significance should be attached to the Jewish Festival of Lights, it is necessary to be more aware of the history of the Maccabean struggle.

The Maccabees were not fighting only the Syrian Greek Hellenizers. They were also in competition with the Pharisees who developed rabbinic Judaism. The Pharisees did not look with great favor on the Maccabees because their victory brought the restoration of priestly Judaism. Thus the early rabbis agreed to recognize only the first phase of the Maccabean victory leading to the recapture of Jerusalem around 165 BCE. And they added the "miracle" of the one day supply of oil which burned for eight days.

But there is much more to the history of the Maccabees than the events to which the celebration of Chanukah is limited. The descendants of the original Maccabees ruled Judea as high priests and kings, for the better part of two centuries until Roman power took over. The Maccabean rulers included Queen Salome Alexandra (not to be confused with the Salome of the seven veils), who brought peace to the land and reached an accord with the Pharisees.

The Maccabean era is recorded in the books, Maccabees I and II, which the rabbis refused to include in the Jewish Holy Scriptures. These books went into the Apocrypha.

The historic significance of the Maccabean era, which started with the rebellion launched by Mattathias, the Hasmonean, and his sons, who became the Maccabees, has been reassessed by modern Jewish historians. One contemporary scholar, Nathan Ausubel, has called it somewhat "baffling" that Chanukah is included with "minor" Jewish festivals. In the "national consciousness" of the Jews, Ausubel states, Chanukah ranks "second to Passover in historical significance."

Moreover the Jewish Festival of Lights is at least two centuries older than the Christian festival of light. Chanukah and Christmas might possibly be traced back to the ancient festival of the Winter Solstice when primitive peoples lit bonfires to bring back the sun. Today, however, we don't have to light bonfires. By the light of the chanukiah we may relate the full story of the Jews in the Maccabean era, a chapter a night for the eight nights.

Here's more modern Chassidic tales...

The response was spectacular! The response was overwhelming! Well, let's just say that the response was "whelming." It seemed that everywhere I went that week — the week I published those powerful Modern Chassidic Tales which I uncovered through astonishingly complex research (not to mention writing them myself, which I just mentioned) — people stopped me on the street and yelled, "WHY DON'T WATCH WHERE THE HECK YOU'RE DRIVING. YOU IDIOT!" And others cried out at me, "DIDN'T YOU SEE THAT STOP SIGN, MANIAC? WHERE ARE THE COPS WHEN YOU NEED THEM?"

By Allan Gould

Well, a few people also said they really enjoyed that selection of Chassidic Tales. Which is why — now that the car is safely in the garage — I here share with you a further selection. See if they continue to move you as much as my driving seems to move others — especially when they are foolishly walking on the sidewalk . . .

THE OFFENSIVE NEIGHBOR

The Baronbinger Rebbe once noted, "If thy neighbor offends thee, refrain from wrath, because a lawyer can cost you a bundle, and the courts are useless.

"On second thought, the lawyer who married my 14th daughter is really struggling to make a living, and could probably give you a deal. Just tell him the Baronbinger Rebbe sent you. Then go ahead and sue the offending neighbor from here to Halifax; life is too short to let some naar push you around, and the judges have to make a parnossa too, you know."

THE MARKHAM REBBE ON WEALTH

Once, the Markham Rebbe was asked about wealth. And, since he always had a lot of time on his hands, being generally unemployed, the Rebbe replied.

— "He who makes fun of others will never be wealthy, especially if it is the boss who you are mocking."

— "Wealth will not remain with that man who buys Lotto 6/49 tickets all the time, for they do not call lotteries 'Tax on the Stupid' for nothing."

— "Poverty is worse than the Ten Plagues. And speaking of 10 plagues, if anyone needs a great Rebbe at their seder table this coming Pesach, I'm available; my wife has threatened to throw me out with the rest of the crumbs."

— "Wine brings poverty, unless you sell it; then you will probably make a lot of money from the shikorim."

— "A change of name and residence often aids in securing a livelihood. Once, when times were tough, my no-good nephew changed his name and address a dozen times, and collected so much welfare, he was able to retire to Florida."

— "It is better to work than to watch daytime television. Actually, it's better to sleep than to watch daytime television. You wouldn't believe some of the garbage I've seen on Oprah and Geraldo. I really have to stop watching that stuff, once and for all."

THE REBBE'S TORAH LESSON

Once, the great Northend-Winnipegger Rebbe was invited to give a drash on Parshat Noah, and he rose and spoke before the hushed, worshipful masses in his congregation:

"Noah had three sons, as you all know. Yet two of them were good and one of them was rotten. Of course, if you named your son 'Ham,' you shouldn't expect a saint to come from this child.

"Still, the fact that all three sons came from the same mother and father, yet one turned out lousy, should teach us a lesson.

"You know, in the previous week's sedrah, both Cain and Abel were sons raised in the same family, and one even killed the other, heaven help us. And let's face it: both Isaac and Ishmael were sons of Avraham Avi-nu, and yet one was a much finer lad. Come to think of it, Jacob and Esau were womb-mates, and one turned out an awful lot better than the other. You know, there is a moral here, somewhere. Actually, my own brother isn't such a nice guy, either, whereas I am the Great Northend-Winnipegger Rebbe. Then again, of my nine children, there are at least three whom I'd prefer not to even talk about."

"You know," concluded the Northend-Winnipegger Rebbe, wiping away his tears, "It's all there in the Torah. Everything is there. Turn it, and turn it, and it's all there."

Cold peace warming up

Reporting from Jerusalem, Sheldon Kirshner assesses Israel's bilateral relationship with Egypt.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel's "cold peace" with Egypt — the first Arab nation to sign a peace treaty with Israel — has begun to warm up.

Yet in spite of the thaw, personally sanctioned by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, officials at the Israeli foreign ministry continue to believe that there is still room for improvement.

As one diplomat put it, "The Egyptians have removed many obstacles to better relations, but there's still a lukewarm official attitude toward Israel."

Israel and Egypt established formal ties in March 1979, less than two years after Anwar al-Sadat, the then Egyptian president, broke with the Arab world and visited Jerusalem. A year later, Israel and Egypt initialled the historic Camp David Accords.

In accordance with its provisions, the two countries signed a series of trade, tourist, agricultural and cultural agreements. But virtually all of them were still-born, the result of Egypt's reluctance to breathe life into them.

Egypt balked at normalization largely out of a strongly-held conviction that Israel was not fulfilling vital clauses in the Camp David Accords related to Palestinian autonomy.

Egypt's policy was also guided by a number of other factors — Israel's refusal to deal with the PLO, which Egypt recognized as the legitimate representative of the Palestinians; Israel's expansion of settlements in the territories; Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights and its destruction of Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981; and finally, Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982.

Shortly after Israel's thrust into Lebanon, Egypt recalled its ambassador from Tel Aviv. He did not return until 1986, following a Cairo summit meeting between Mubarak, Sadat's successor, and Shimon Peres, the Israeli prime minister.

Tensions flared again in 1987 with the outbreak of the intifadah, the Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

These events exacted a terrible toll on normalization. Trade suffered, cultural agreements were sidelined, the flow of Egyptian tourists to Israel was pitiful, Egyptian intellectuals and professional associations boycotted Israel, Israeli diplomats in Cairo were socially shunned and became targets of Islamic fundamentalists, and the Egyptian media demonized Israel and caricatured Jews.

Despite Israeli protests, a deep chill set in. And it lasted, more or less, until earlier this year, when Mubarak declared an interest in improving relations with Israel.

Mubarak's decision was a function of Israel's rapprochement with the PLO, capped by the September 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP) and the May 1994 Cairo agreement which effectively activated the DoP.

Since then, much to Israel's satisfaction, Egypt has taken concrete steps to normalize relations.

The volume of trade has increased. In 1993, it reached the $30 million mark, up from $13 million in 1992. (Egyptian oil exports to Israel, which are substantial, are not included in these figures.)

"This is still peanuts," said an Israeli official. "But the Egyptian side wants to expand trade, which could reach $100 million on an annual basis."

Now that the Gulf States have abolished the secondary and tertiary boycott of Israel, many Egyptian businessmen are no longer afraid to deal with Israel openly, the official added.

Last month, a delegation of 40 Egyptian entreprenuers attended an economic conference in Jerusalem, the first time so great a number had come to Israel. "They established good contacts, and joint ventures were planned," the official said.

In essence, they were consolidating relations that had already been forged in May, when a consortium of Israelis and Egyptians agreed to build an oil refinery in the Alexandria Free Trade Zone.

Volume of trade has increased and better cultural ties seen imminent

Today, Egyptian businessmen are no longer obliged to apply for a special permit to travel to Israel. And in a departure from previous practices, their Israeli counterparts can now obtain multiple visas without running into bureaucratic roadblocks.

Egyptians wishing to visit Israel for pleasure can do so without requesting a "yellow pass," which has been suspended. Of late, about 1,000 Egyptian tourists have been visiting Israel each month. The majority are Coptic pilgrims.

Far more Israelis — some 10,000 monthly — visit Egypt, mainly the Sinai Peninsula.

By all accounts, Egypt, troubled by a drastic slump in tourist traffic caused by Islamic fundamentalist violence, is eager to increase Israeli tourism. Indeed, the Egyptian minister of tourism visited Israel recently, expressing an interest in joint ventures, especially in Sinai.

Cultural relations, the weakest link in Israel's bilateral relationship with Egypt, are on the upswing. Nearly a year ago, a new protocol was signed. And later this month, in an unprecedented gesture, the Egyptian minister of culture is expected to arrive in Israel.

Last summer, a prominent Cairo playwright, Ali Salem, toured Israel. His book, a Visit to Israel, published in Arabic, is considered something of a landmark — the first objective account of Israeli society by an Egyptian. A second edition is in the works.

Officials in Jerusalem also take note of other recent achievements in the cultural sphere — the permission given to Israeli archeologists to participate in Sinai digs; the first-ever appearance of Egyptian translators of Hebrew literature at a conference in Israel; the memorandum calling for joint television productions.

And now Israeli diplomats are pleased that Mubarak has finally deigned to honor Israel with his presence. He is expected in January, after President Ezer Weizman and his wife pay an official visit to Cairo later this month.

"No one really understands why Mubarak hasn't visited till now," a diplomat observed. "Your answer is as good as mine."

Despite Egypt's efforts at improving relations with Israel, much remains to be done.

Most Egyptian intellectuals and professionals are hostile to Israel, given their belief that Israel's ultimate objective is to dominate the Arab world. Not surprisingly, they attacked Ali Salem's book as Israeli propaganda.

And the Egyptian media is less than forthcoming toward Israel. "I won't say they want to break the peace with Israel and start a war," said a diplomat who has served in Egypt. "But they are anything but friendly."

The litany of accusations against Israel is familiar and absurd — Israeli tourists are spies whose objective is to corrupt good Muslims; Israeli agricultural advisors have deliberately released pests to damage Egypt's vital cotton crop; the Mossad has dispatched prostitutes to spread AIDS.

Israeli officials are still shocked that Amr Moussa, Egypt's foreign minister, had to be pressured into visiting the Children's Memorial at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial-cum museum when he stopped in Jerusalem last September on an official visit.

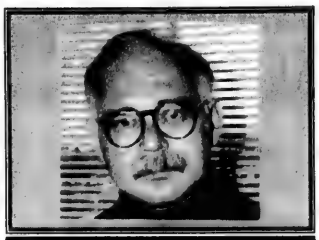
Moussa's insensitivity, an official remarked, was emblematic of Egypt's "lack of understanding of Israel and its values."

As well, diplomats here are concerned by a speech Moussa recently delivered at the United Nations linking normalization with Israel to Israel's nuclear disarmament.

Furthermore, they fear that Egypt has embarked on a campaign to persuade Arab League members not to forge relations with Israel until it signs a peace treaty with Syria. Last month, for example, Egypt blocked a move by the Comoros Islands, a predominantly Muslim state in the Indian Ocean, to establish ties with Israel.

Worrisome though these developments may be, Israeli diplomats here seem convinced that Israel and Egypt have opened a new chapter in their often tubulent relations.

Israel's relations with Egypt have improved of late. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak confers with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres at a 1993 meeting.



Mideast Analysis

By Sheldon Kirshner

Anxiety, disappointment, anger and disillusionment are gripping Israel these days. At least this was the lingering impression I left with after spending three weeks in the country last month.

Given Israel's historic and long-awaited peace treaty with Jordan, Israel's new above-board relations with Morocco and Tunisia, and the prospect of ties with Syria and the Gulf States, you'd think that Israelis would be in a better frame of mind.

But, sad to say, this is not the case. The cause of their gloom, as I discovered in conversations with friends, acquaintances and strangers, is terrorism.

It is sapping their optimism and dulling their enthusiasm, at a time when Israel's international situation has never been as promising.

Israelis, except those who oppose the current peace process, were surprised and heartened by Israel's September 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP) with the PLO. It seemed as if an era of confrontation, mutual suspicion and bloodshed that had pitted Israel against the Palestinians was finally coming to a close.

No one was under any illusion that the implementation of the DoP — the key to the exercise — would be trouble-free and not strewn with formidable pitfalls. The hard part, we instictively understood, would come only after the famous Rabin-Arafat handshake of reconciliation on the White House lawn. The gritty nuts and bolts of the process would indeed be the daunting challenge, the crucial difference between success and failure of a noble effort at peacemaking.

Nevertheless, even the most hardened cynic could not have imagined that one of the by-products of the peace process would be indiscriminate terrorism of the Hamas and Islamic Jihad variety.

Israelis, of course, were painfully aware that these fanatical groups were against peace as well as Israel's very existence. In this sense, they were not dwelling in a fool's paradise. But who among them could have known that the enemies of peace would strike with such heartlessness and ferociousness?

By official count, more than 100 Israelis — soldiers and civilians — have been killed since the DoP was signed. Every death has touched Israel, but none as much as the horrific Oct. 19 bomb blast in the centre of Tel Aviv which, in a single agonizing moment, snuffed out the lives of 22 innocents.

It was not by chance that Hamas targeted Dizengoff Street. It is Tel Aviv's main thoroughfare, a throbbing symbol of the practical Zionism that Arab rejectionists detest so much.

This suicide bombing not only shook Israelis, but also prompted them to wonder whether the PLO is capable of, or interested in, containing terrorism in areas under its jurisdiction. No one seriously believes that the PLO can stamp out terrorism. After all, Israel itself has not.

Yet as weary as they are of terrorism, Israelis know that the clock cannot be turned back, that a Palestinian state is inevitable, and that Arafat, for all his faults, is Israel's partner in shaping the contours of peace.

What are the alternatives? The status quo ante? Hamas? Islamic Jihad? Realistic Israelis realize that a long, hard road lies ahead.

Jewish Life

Happiness a product of Jewish way of life

TORONTO — In appearance and religious practice, Rabbi Ezriel Tauber is strictly Orthodox — complete with full beard and long black coat — but there's nothing traditional about his explanation of the Jewish way of life.

"The whole world is the hardware, the Torah is the software, and the Shulchan Aruch is our instruction book on how to operate this computer [called life]," said the New York-based rabbi, author and businessman at a recent Sunday program for women presented at Baycrest Terrace by the Women's Division of Aish HaTorah.

Rabbi Tauber, one of two keynote speakers at the program (the other was Christian-raised Tova Mordechai), spoke on Happiness: How To Get More From Your Life. The theme of the day was Enjoy Life! It's A Gift to Treasure.

People aren't happy because they don't know how to define the term, said the rabbi. He said the North American entertainment and food industries have derailed pursuit of self-awareness in favor of escapism. In Judaism, instead of "escaping life," you have to "appreciate your role, learn about your mission and pursue what G-d wants from you. Without that, happiness cannot be obtained."

Every moment of life is priceless, said Rabbi Tauber, whose family history bears dramatic testimony to his words.

Ezriel Tauber was born in 1938 in Czechoslovakia. By 1944, the 6-year-old boy had three little brothers and his mother was pregnant with a fifth child. The family had been living in Hungary since the previous year, passing as gentiles.

Against all odds, both parents and all four children survived the Holocaust, and the rabbi's mother subsequently had five more children.

In 1944, his very pregnant mother was sent to Auschwitz. When the infamous Dr. Josef Mengele asked for volunteers to have labor induced, the rabbi's mother came forward.

"She delivered a healthy baby girl, but she didn't want to look, since she knew she'd never see her again," Rabbi Tauber told the rapt audience of 200 women.

After the birth, she heard an announcement: " 'Everyone who is well should get back to work.' My mother said, 'I'm well,' and she smuggled herself back into the work camp. She didn't even have a number on her arm."

There she met her sister-in-law, who hid her and enabled her to survive the war.

"My mother was only fighting for a moment of life," Rabbi Tauber explained. Recently — 50 years later — both his parents shared in a family simchah when the youngest of his 12 children married.

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI NANCY WECHSLER

Let me tell you about a dream. It is a vision for the Jewish community in Toronto, a potential idea for communities everywhere. It is based on the belief that there truly is a Jewish response to illness and that communities can unite to meet the needs of those who suffer. A possible name for the dream is "The Jewish Healing Centre."

What is a Jewish Healing Centre? It might be a place where Jews struggling with illness find spiritual support. Individuals, for example, who are fighting an illness would know where to call for accessible Jewish resources on healing, such as books, articles, tapes and videos, or to find counselling. It could also be a resource for the loved ones of those who are ill, by providing Jewishly-oriented and issue-specific support groups.

It might be a place where workshops and presentations on Jewish approaches to illness would be taught for health care professionals. Hospitals would be given opportunities to have seminars on the Jewish perspective of various bioethical issues taught by the staff of the Jewish Healing Centre.

The mandate of a Jewish Health Centre would not be to replace the synagogue or the synagogue rabbi. Rather it would be an organized place with the specific objectives of teaching, counselling and offering resources on the spiritual perspective of illness and healing.

A Jewish Healing Centre might offer a training and support group for local rabbis who want to further develop their pastoral work. Many rabbis visit the sick as part of their congregational service; however, to further expand chaplaincy skills through Jewish auspices would be most helpful.

The organization might also reach out to those who battle addictions. Our people, like society at large, confront a variety of addictions. Many churches give space to AA and other such recovery groups; yet, for a number of reasons, it is rare for a synagogue to house them. Having our own Jewish Healing Centre with trained professionals and materials might provide Jewish vocabulary and Jewish concepts for our people who are fighting addictions.

Perhaps more synagogues would be able to provide monthly help groups or healing services, assisted by a staff person from the Jewish Healing Centre. Ultimately, a Jewish Healing Centre could bring bikkur cholim and the Jewish commitment to the power of healing to the forefront.

One of the successful models of a Jewish Healing Centre exists currently in San Francisco. It was founded three years ago by rabbis whose desire was to make accessible the broad range of concrete responses that Judaism can offer to Jews struggling with illness. The wellspring of this vision was the knowledge that Judaism can and must bring comfort and spiritual healing to Jews who are in pain, for as the Talmud declares, there can be no greater mitzvah than bringing comfort to those who are ill.

In February of last year, the Jewish Healing Centre sponsored Refaeinu 1994: A Practicum on Healing and the Rabbinate, a three-day conference on Jewish responses to illness attended by more than 130 rabbis and other Jewish professionals from several denominations. The response was very positive.

This January, two congregations: one in Hamilton, the other in Thornhill will be sponsoring a family retreat called Body and Soul: How Judaism Heals. Issues related to the spirituality of well-being will be addressed. It is hoped that this retreat will be a model for other congregations to explore.

The dream for a Jewish Healing Centre beckons. Such a venture requires cooperation from the diversity of Jewish expression within our communities. The benefit from this work, for the sake of the ill and those who care for them cannot be overestimated. At a time when so many are challenged with illness, the establishment of a Jewish Healing Centre would allow the community to respond in a direct, compassionate and spiritually accessible manner.

A midrash is told in the Zohar, Behalotcha 15 about Moses praying to God for the healing of his sister Miriam's leprosy. The rabbis wonder why Moses uttered such a short prayer on her behalf in contrast to the more lengthy prayers he uttered for all of Israel.

And Moses cried out to God saying the words: K'el na refah na la (Heal her now, O God, I beseech You). Rabbi Shimon came and saw that when Moses ordered his prayers for the sake of all Israel, he offered a long prayer. Why was this so? Rabbi Abba said, K'el na refa na la is not just any prayer; it is the secret of God's holy name.

The most direct prayer to God on the behalf of the sick need not be long-winded or overly political in nature. The direct plea from Moses, K'el na refah na la (Heal her now, O God, I beseech You), was all that was required for his prayers to reach God. The intention behind Moses' succinct petition flowed powerfully from his heart and ultimately brought comfort to his sister.

It is in this spirit that the dream of a Jewish Healing Centre is offered. May it be God's will that such a centre is created, cooperatively, in our communities.

Rabbi Nancy Wechsler is the spiritual leader of Temple Kol Ami in Thornhill. Her rabbinical dissertation focuses on rabbinical attitudes toward healing.

Memory disorders being explored at Baycrest

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The scientist who discovered why people with brain disease can retain some memories while losing others was honored recently at a reception at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The work of Dr. Endel Tulving, who holds a major research post at Baycrest, may lead to breakthroughs in Alzheimer's disease and other memory impairments, said research vice-president Dr. Donald Stuss.

Tulving, who holds the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Chair in Cognitive Neuroscience, this year was awarded the Izaak Walton Killam prize, Canada's most prestigious science award, and the Gold Life Medal Achievement Award from the American Psychological Foundation.

"Understanding memory disorders is crucial to understanding normal memory, and vice versa. They are two sides of the same coin," Tulving told The CJN.

His work has shown we have different memory systems for events and for learned skills, which is why people with brain disease can remember some things and not others. He is currently mapping the brain to discover the neural bases for these complex systems.

Tulving is involved in a cooperative project of the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest, the Clarke Institute and the University of Toronto, studying a method of measuring how the brain stores memory.

Dr. Endel Tulving

According to the Canada Council, which administers the Killam Prize, "Endel Tulving is regarded as the leading and most influential, original and productive cognitive scientist and research psychologist in Canada and as one of the outstanding cognitive researchers in the world."

The ability of Baycrest to attract Tulving to its research team is part of its aim to improve life for older citizens, chairman Stephen Cole said.

A lighter moment occurred when Cole presented Tulving, who is not Jewish, with eight cans of tennis balls, one for each candle lit at Chanukah. A new tennis racquet accompanied the balls in recognition of the scientist's excellence as a doubles partner.

Stuss paid tribute to Anne Tanenbaum for setting up the chair which brought Tulvig to Baycrest, and said he had worked with Tulving on frontal lobe lesions. "I'm going to have it marked on my tombstone that I was on Dr. Tulving's team."

Baycrest president Stephen Herbert presented Tulving with a ceramic sphere made by Michelle Aranoff, a member of the Wagman Centre.

The scientist said he'll study the sculpture at home to decide whether it represents an orb or a brain.

"I've had lots of fun in my scientific sand box," he said. "I love you all."

JCC creditors back plan to restructure

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Community Centre (JCC) has cleared another hurdle on the road to its organizational restructuring.

Last week, a meeting of the JCC's creditors approved a proposal that will see the Bank of Montreal (BMO), the JCC's principal secured creditor, receive $9.1 million of the $10.5 million owed to it, and other secured creditors paid in full.

The proposal envisions payment in full to trades and suppliers, up to a total of $2.25 million; full payment of Honeywell's $990,000 claim and complete replenishing of $3.4 million in capital endowments.

If approved by the court, the restructuring and distribution to creditors could take place by February 1995.

Revenue Canada, which is owed approximately $500,000 in unremitted payroll deductions, will be paid out of the $2.25 million pool, as will the former JCC and Leah Posluns Theatre (LPT) employees.

According to the proposal, the employees will be paid "unpaid vacation pay; plus termination pay as stipulated under the Employment Standards Act; plus severance pay as stipulated under the ESA; plus the following enhancements: minimum severance pay equal to five weeks regular salary; plus further three per cent for each year of service at the [JCC]."

Should the total claims of the unsecured regular creditors and unsecured employee creditors exceed $2.25 million, Revenue Canada will receive $442,000 and the former employees will receive $2,000 each. The remaining funds will be distributed pro rata to the unsecured creditors and to the unpaid portion of the employee creditors.

Robert Harlang, spokesman for Richter & Partners, the JCC's court-appointed receiver, said the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto would be the principal source of funds for the creditors.

In a question period that preceded the creditors' vote (there was only one dissenting ballot), Harlang said the Federation would be on the hook for $4.5 million to the BMO for sale of the Bathurst property plus an addition $600,000 it will guarantee on closing the deal, $2.25 million to the unsecured creditors, $3.4 million to the endowments, almost $1 million to Honeywell and $250,000 per year for three years in guarantees to a new members' group which will take over the Bloor centre. It will also arrange a $2.5 million line of credit for the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), which will manage the Bathurst Street facility.

Kamin, who was representing his father's estate, which was part of the JCC's depleted endowment funds, said the Federation could have avoided a lot of anxiety and distress in the community if it had agreed in the summer to meet all the JCC's financial obligations.

Reva Stern, former artistic director of the LPT, said a vocal campaign by the terminated theatre staff was instrumental in seeing all unsecured creditors being paid in full. Stern said the sums to be paid fired staff under the ESA are inadequate and the staff is not finished fighting for better severance packages. Stern also said that should the LPT reopen, she would like to have her old job back at the head of the theatre.

Kamin to challenge arrangement

Another questioner pointed out that yerusha (lifetime) members had been told the yerushas would be treated as an endowment fund.

Harlang said the JCC's records do not disclose that yerushas were treated as endowments and the current proposal does not contemplate the yerusha holders as creditors. He said about 100 yerusha members were affected.

Bernard Kamin, a former president of the JCC, said he objected to a proposal that will see the Federation, which is replenishing the endowments, appoint half the board of directors of the BJC, which will administer the endowments. That would be a conflict of interest, he asserted.

Kamin later told The CJN he planned to challenge that arrangement in court.

CJC hosts citizenship court to welcome new Canadians

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was Canada's reputation as an "open country" which welcomes people from abroad that prompted the Liberman family to choose to build their futures in Canada, said 30-year-old Boris Liberman.

"Everybody is from someplace. They all came from somewhere," he said.

A native of Kiev in the former Soviet Union, Boris, along with his parents, Nahum and Dora, became three of Canada's newest citizens last week at a special sitting of the Court of Canadian Citizenship, hosted by Canadian Jewish Congress at the Lipa Green Building.

The event coincided with United Nations Human Rights Day.

The Libermans were among 70 new Canadians from 27 countries of origin whom Citizenship Judge Margarita Okhovati urged to add their talents to Canada's "treasure trove."

Canada is a land built by immigrants, one whose culture is enriched through the work, talents, customs and traditions of newcomers, Okhovati told the new citizens.

Okhovati urged the new Canadians to participate fully in Canadian society and adopt Canada's tradition of tolerance to others.

With the exception of Native peoples, "we are all newcomers to Canada," Okhovati said.

Joining the new Canadians in affirming their allegiance were several leaders of ethnocultural organizations such as the Federation of Portuguese Canadian Business and Professionals, the National Association of Japanese Canadians and the Canadian Hispanic Congress. Also present was Maurice Benzacar, president of the Ontario Sephardic Association.

Gerda Frieberg, chair of the Ontario region of Congress, compared Canada to a bouquet of flowers, adding that Congress fights racists and bigots, the "weeds" in the garden.

Irving Abella, national president of Congress, said new Canadians can look forward to a future of unlimited prospects, but that has not always been the case. A generation ago, Canada was often bigotted, xenophobic and closed inwards against immigrants.

Abella, co-author of None is Too Many, a history of Canada's closed-door policy towards Jewish refugees fleeing the Nazis, paid tribute to "pioneering immigrants" whose goals of equity, civility and diversity helped make Canada a more hospitable country for immigrants.

He urged the new citizens to take part in the ongoing debate on Canadian self-definition. Canada's pluralist nature welcomes their input, and unlike the land of birth for many of them, it accepts the premise that citizens can criticize the country while still loving it, he said.

Boris Liberman echoed those sentiments, saying he looked forward to the responsibilities of citizenship and the right to vote.

He and his wife of three years, Maya, a Hebrew teacher at Holy Blossom school, have already put down substantial roots. Their son, Arik was born less than a year ago in Mount Sinai Hospital, becoming a citizen ahead of his father.

Winterlude at BJC

TORONTO — Registration at the Bathurst Jewish Centre's unique winter day camp is up 30 per cent from last year.

About 150 children are attending Winterlude, the Jewish community's only camp this season. The two-week camp includes Jewish content, swimming, arts and crafts, music, dance, sports and trips. The BJC will not accept campers just for the day.

According to the BJC's programming director, Karen Nusbaum, Winterlude is the perfect solution for keeping kids busy over the holidays when parents have little time off, or can't afford a vacation in the sun.

Winterlude welcomes special needs children. The low counsellor-to-camper ratio allows staff to pay special attention to each participant.

Winterlude, now in its 10th year, costs $150 per child per week for a full day and $90 for a half day.

The BJC also operates camps during spring break, Passover and the summer.

Murdered soldier's mother comforted by peace hopes

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It has been a long autumn for Esther Waxman and her family.

It is only now that the tragedy of losing her 19-year-old son Nachshon Oct. 14 to Hamas terrorists has really started to sink in.

In an interview with The CJN during a stopover in Montreal to deliver a talk sponsored by the Hillel Jewish Student Centre, Waxman at times struggled to keep her composure.

But she continued to maintain the same air of stoicism and to express the same fervent desire for peace — and not revenge — that seemed to set her family apart from many other victims of terror in Israel and galvanized an entire nation.

"I believe the drama of the kidnapping and the mobilization in prayer and hope was unprecedented in modern Jewish history," said Waxman, a 47-year-old New York teacher, who moved to Israel in 1969 with her husband, Yehudah. "That's what made it unique."

Since her son's death, which took place during a failed attempt by Israeli commandos to free him from captivity, Waxman, who is Orthodox, has resumed her teaching career.

But she also has been striving to keep Nachshon's memory alive by speaking out for peace and by having memorial funds established in his name.

Her message in Montreal, where she was to speak at the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue, would be one "of solidarity and unity," she said.

Earlier, Waxman was in Chicago to address a Friends of the Israel Defence Force dinner launching a scholarship fund in Nachshon's memory and in New York to see members of her family.

Esther Waxman

Other projects in Nachshon's memory have included a Jewish National Fund forest and even Torahs being written in his honor, his mother said.

These endeavors, she said, have brought the family a measure of comfort.

During and since their week-long ordeal, the Waxman family, she said, received some 13,000 messages of support — from Jews and non-Jews alike.

But Waxman claimed media reports that the family would now be prepared for Israel to make conciliatory overtures to Hamas are false.

"We are not forgiving or understanding towards them," Waxman says.

She does not, however, preclude the possibility that Israel will one day negotiate with Hamas, as it eventually did with the PLO.

This, however, should only take place if, and only if, Hamas "advocates peace.

"But they do not [yet]," she said. "Several years ago, it was a felony in Israel to speak to the PLO, but now they hug and kiss each other."

Waxman also says she has never blamed the Israeli military for the raid that ended in her son's death, although "we would have done anything to save him, even more negotiations.

"If they sent in dozens of troops, they intended to succeed," says Waxman. "But they failed."

Waxman says her religious faith has not been shaken by the tragedy.

"People have a mission in life," she said. "Nachshon made a greater contribution in his 19 years than others do in 90 years and we're very proud of him.

"Faith doesn't lessen pain, but it does give some sort of meaning to continue."

Bronfman fellowships send youth to Israel

ALBANY, New York — Applications are available for the 1995 Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel.

The fellowships, now in their ninth year, offer an opportunity for 26 students entering Grade 12 to spend five weeks in Israel this summer.

Fellows will be chosen on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. In the competitive selection process, merit, not financial need, is the standard for selection.

While living in Jerusalem, the Bronfman Fellows participate in seminars and dialogues representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs. In addition, fellows will meet with some of Israel's prominent political and literary figures to examine contemporary issues in light of Jewish history and tradition.

The Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel is a program of the Samuel Bronfman Foundation, Inc., which is chaired by Edgar M. Bronfman.

The program begins on July 10, 1995 with a two-day seminar in New York City. The students return from Israel on August 16, 1995. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in the spirit of the day. All expenses are covered by the program, including round-trip international transportation, room and board, travel in Israel and incidentals.

High school students in the United States and Canada who will be in Grade 12 in the fall of 1995 may obtain aplication forms and detailed information by writing: The Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, 17 Wilbur St., Albany, N.Y., 12202, or by calling (518) 465-6575.

Completed applications must be postmarked no later than Feb. 1, 1995. Finalists will be notified March 5 and finalist interviews will be held during the week of March 27. Names of the 1995 Fellowship recipients will be announced on April 7.

'Michael is with a family at the moment'

There's a strong probability that Michael Benjamin is with a family when another one calls.

Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.

For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with a licensed funeral director who is Jewish.

There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.

They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.

Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

About People

Shelley Stillman

STILLMAN NAMED CHAIR

Trustee Shelley Stillman has been acclaimed chair of the North York Board of Education for a second term. Elected to the board in 1985, she has chaired many committees including budget and property. As chair, she will also serve as one of the five North York Board representatives on the Metro Toronto School Board.

Stillman said the coming year presents "a challenge to meet higher public expectations for education in a time of shrinking tax resources. I will continue to emphasize themes of school board accountability to the public for student achievement as well as for high standards of quality and service in public schools."

Teaching sex to teens

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How to help teenagers resist pressure from peers, movies, television and society in general to have sex was the topic of a recent panel discussion.

"We cannot equivocate on this," said Rabbi Marvin Pachino, headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

The discussion, held at Adath Israel and attended by 50 adults and 20 young people, also included mention of the controversial decision to place condom machines in North York schools and a debate on the role of parents and the schools in teaching about sex.

Rabbi Pachino said CHAT's sex education policy is being revamped, with the program to begin in Grade 9 instead of Grade 12.

The Ontario ministry of education specifies that Grade 9 students must receive sex education and condom information.

Quoting a report that 20 per cent of 14-year-olds and 50 per cent of 16-year-olds are sexually active, moderator Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel asked Rabbi Pachino: "How can you expect people to put off sex until they are married?"

Rabbi Pachino replied: "It has to be a realistic expectation from where I sit."

The CHAT headmaster, who has taught in Jewish high schools for 22 years, said attitudes and behaviors have changed noticeably, mainly because of the influence of mass culture and "mixed signals" from parents.

"We can't vacuum pack our kids and break the wrapper when we march them down to the chupah," he said.

To redirect energy, the North York Board of Education asks senior students to encourage younger students "to put off sex" and take up other activities, said panelist Mac Bury, the board's coordinator of physical and health education.

He also said it is important for teens to have more than one group of friends in case there is too much pressure to go the sex route from one group.

As for the board's decision to put condom machines into its schools, Bury, a father of adolescents, said despite his feelings to the contrary, he accepted the policy "as a way of preventing deaths from sexuallly transmitted diseases."

Psychologist Alan Bardikoff said both girls and boys are now reaching puberty at an earlier age and this complicates the situation.

Since in his view most 16-year-olds aren't mature enough for sexual relationships, Bardikoff said malaise lay behind their behavior. "I don't know whether it is true of the Jewish community, but I do know that in the inner cities adolescents feel there is nothing ahead of them," he said. "They have a sense of this is the way it is."

Bury believes parents need to play a role in to avoid this. "Sex education is a shared responsibility with families. The government is making it more and more clear that schools must reflect basic human values," he said. "They cannot be value-neutral."

In answer to a question from the audience, Rabbi Pachino said a Jewish sex ethic does not allow sex outside of marriage, even between two individuals committed to each other.

Susan Haber, head of the shul's adult education committee, chaired the meeting.

CHANUKAH PARTY

Associated scholarships

TORONTO — The Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto has announced it will be accepting applications for scholarships in higher Jewish studies.

These scholarships are granted annually to qualifying candidates, with the monies from a special fund established by friends of Associated who are interested in higher Jewish education.

Louis Weisfeld is chair of the scholarship committee. Deadline for receipt of applications is March 31, 1995. Applications should be made for courses taken in the following academic year. Awards cannot be retroactive.

The awards are designed to assist graduates of Associated who propose to pursue post-secondary Judaic studies in a recognized institution in Israel. Priority will be given to applicants who seek to prepare themselves for a career in teaching in the Hebrew studies department at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Candidates must be graduates of Grade 8 at Associated and graduates of a recognized Jewish senior day high school or yeshivah, who have completed their formal studies (at high school, university or yeshivah).

All awards are for a single year but the School will entertain applications for renewal. Payment of awards and renewal of awards will be conditional on receipt of satisfactory evidence that the candidate has successfully completed the program for which the award was made.

Requests for a scholarship grant must be made on forms obtainable from the Associated Hebrew Schools scholarship committee, 3630 Bathurst Street, Toronto, Ontario M6A 2B3 (789-7471).

Age no barrier to active senior

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 83, Romanian-born artist Tutzi Seguin is busier than many people half her age.

She welcomes a reporter to her modest mid-town Toronto house with a cup of coffee and a serving bowl filled with European-style nothings topped with a sprinkle of fruit sugar.

"You have to taste some of my specialty," she insists, settling into a chair to discuss her upcoming appearance on Vision TV's The Time of Your Life. The show, hosted by Jan Tennant, profiles people whose lives show that the years after 40 can offer options, growth and change.

Seguin's art, unlike her baking, isn't confined to one specialty. (Actually, she has taught classes in strudel-making.) The house she shares with her husband of 68 years, George, 89, and their 13-year-old dog, Leroy, is filled with evidence of the multi-media artist's creativity.

On the living room walls hang framed prints, collages, watercolors and oil paintings. The dining room table is piled with unframed works, in preparation for an upcoming sale. In the front window hangs a stained-glass piece. Even the lamps and end tables bear Seguin's artistic touch.

A recent painting rests on an easel in a back room that serves as her studio. Nearby hangs a series of hand-painted silk scarves heated in Seguin's microwave to set the colors. Ceramics, stained glass, and colorful glass bowls are all part of her repertoire. A few years ago she began a "recycling project," using her kiln to transform beer bottles into objets d'art.

Her works range in price from $15 to over $1,000 and include Jewish, floral and mother-and-child themes.

Ever since the oldest of her three children died of a congenital heart condition in 1955, Seguin's art has been her compulsion, her therapy and her way of giving to herself and others. Only one of her three children is still alive; a daughter died of cancer in 1983.

Seguin's life revolves around her art; a joint exhibition last year with her granddaughter, artist Kim McNeilly, was a high point.

The television episode was filmed in one day; a crew followed the energetic artist from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m. — preparing breakfast for George and a guest, driving herself to a local community centre to teach an art class, taking a tai chi class, having lunch with her granddaughter, bargaining over art supplies at Gwartzman's on Spadina, and returning to her studio.

Seguin has taught art for years, and has continued to study and experiment with different art forms.

The Time of Your Life segment profiling Seguin will appear on the Women's Television Network (WTN) on Jan. 3 at 8:30 p.m. and on Vision TV on Jan. 6 at 10 p.m. Upcoming segments include profiles on Adele Fogle, who got her pilot's licence at age 40 (second week in January) and on Lois Lilienstein of Sharon, Lois and Bram (Feb. 14 on WTN, Feb. 17 on Vision).

Coles founder dies

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Carl Cole, the man who revolutionized bookselling in Canada with Coles Book Stores, died Dec. 12 in Toronto. He was 82.

The cause of death was cancer, said his son Ted.

Cole began Coles Book Stores in 1934 while studying commerce at the University of Toronto. The original Book Exchange store, which bought and sold used textbooks, was a way for Cole and his brother and two sisters "to make money," Ted Cole said. "They didn't know a thing about books."

The store moved to its flagship location at Yonge and Charles streets in 1940, and eventually grew to include 137 North American outlets before it was sold to Southam Inc. in 1978.

Richard King, president of the 1,200-member Canadian Booksellers Association, said the Coles and the Melzack family, founders of Classics, invented the modern book store. "We wouldn't be in business today in my store if it weren't for them," he said from Montreal.

The self-effacing Cole supported many Jewish charities in Toronto and in Israel. The Pearl Cole Endowment Fund at Baycrest was named after his late wife, and the Carl and Pearl Cole Athletic Wing was opened at the Bathurst Jewish Centre 12 years ago after sons Ted and Bruce donated $500,000 in their parents' name.

Cole is survived by brother Jack and sister Mary Gold, sons Ted and Bruce, and seven grandchildren.

Torontonian helps promote hockey in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

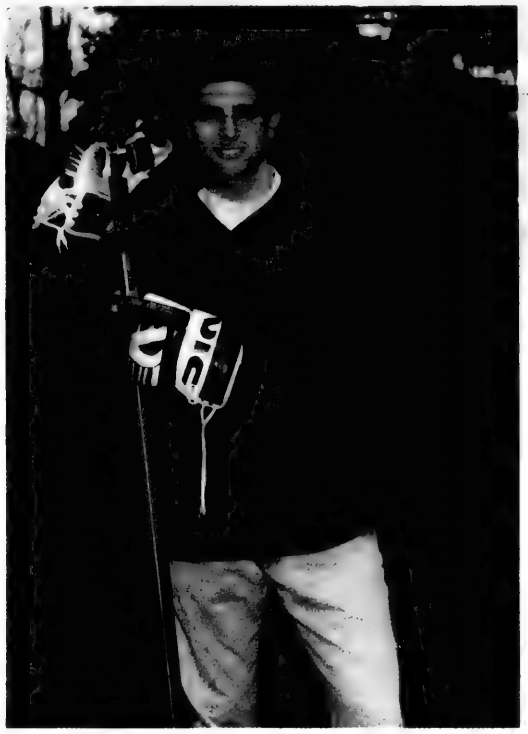
TORONTO — If small town Canada has become a fertile breeding ground for some of the best hockey players ever produced in the Great White North, there's no reason to believe Metulla can't do the same for Israel.

At least that's what promoters of the sport in the Jewish state are hoping. The latest Canuck to pack his equipment bag and fly over to "the Haliburton of Israel" to try to give the local hockey programs an assist is Jonathan Graff, a 24-year-old volunteer in a joint Metulla/United Israel Appeal (UIA) program to staff Metulla's Canada Centre hockey rink.

Graff will be joining Waterloo native and good friend Jeff Budd in helping Israeli kids learn hockey fundamentals, Canadian style.

A native of Toronto, Graff played many years for Forest Hill, making his way through the peewee, bantam and midget programs. He played some high school hockey as well as intramural shinny at university.

Now, with his broad background in Canada's national pastime and equipped with copies of Don Cherry's Rock 'Em Sock 'Em videos and the movie Slapshot, Graff is going to Israel to teach some Sabras the finer points of the game — everything from skating, shooting and strategy to the manly art of dropping the gloves and saying, "You wanna go?"



Jonathan Graff

Yikes, here come the Metulla Chiefs.

Graff had his tongue planted firmly in his cheek when describing the roughhouse hockey he hoped to bring to the Holy Land, though his repeated references to Eddie Shore and "oldtime hockey" might suggest otherwise. Instead, he focused on the opportunity he is receiving to combine a love of Israel with a passion for the game of hockey.

Canada Centre rink proves a hit with kids in Metulla

For the next four months, Graff will join his bud, Budd, manning the trenches at Canada Centre and moulding young Israelis in the finer points of Canada's game.

Canada Centre is the recreational complex built with Canadian contributions provided by the UIA. Its hockey rink has proven a smash hit with kids in Metulla and the surrounding communities, as well as a Mecca for visitors to Israel's north. Construction is underway to add an Olympic-sized ice surface alongside the current, quarter-size rink.

Graff's role as on-ice instructor is a volunteer position. He's paying for his own airfare but once in Metulla, the city will provide him with either an apartment or a room at Canada Centre while the UIA will ante up $400 per month for living expenses.

Graff and Budd could be merely the advance wave of other young Canadian volunteers working in Israel, said UIA spokesman Eli Rubenstein.

Like the old Zionist credo that called on Jews to build and be built by Israel, current thinking reflects the view that volunteers can form a living bridge between the Diaspora and Israel, Rubenstein said.

Budd, a participant in the Anguish to Hope program, was the first volunteer. He is now a full-time employee of Canada Centre. The UIA's computers contain five names of other young people who have expressed interest in making the move to Metulla.

Meanwhile, the UIA is already planning next May's Anguish to Hope trip that will include stops in Poland, the Czech Republic, Jordan and Israel. Some of the participants may be bringing along their skates for a challenge match set for May 17 when the Sabras will take on the Canucks in an exhibition match, hopefully in the new Olympic-sized ice rink.

"We'll see how good they are," said Rubenstein. "It'll be the first-ever Canada-Israel faceoff."

A word of warning to the Canucks. If you see three sabras wearing thick, black-framed glasses rounding the net and heading up ice, duck.

Rabbi marks 50 years at shul

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Spending 50 years in one job is almost unheard of today, but Rabbi David Spiro believes that "when you love something, nothing is difficult."

Rabbi Spiro, spiritual leader of the Sgoolai Israel Synagogue in Fredericton, N.B., has had a 50-year love affair with Fredericton and its people.

"[In 1944] there were 30 families in the congregation, many from the European element who respected the ways of Orthodoxy," said the 72-year-old rabbi. "Today it is different. The intensity factor is not there. The desire to have a minyan is not there, particularly with an older congregation, from which many members go to Florida in the winter."

The Sgoolai Israel Synagogue's 65 families, which 10 years ago numbered 90, have aged along with Rabbi Spiro. Members consider him as more than just a leader of the Fredericton Jewish community.

"He has been a friend and an advisor on everything," said Miriam Green, who helped coordinate a 50th anniversary dinner.

"He has guided us in the kitchen, sometimes not so positively as far as we were concerned, but always doing the right thing. 'It's not me,' he would say to us. 'I'm just doing what's written in the Torah.' "

One woman, whose two children attended the rabbi's Hebrew classes, said his teaching "prepared them to daven in any shul in the world. The bar mitzvah boys could read from the Torah and lead services."

Frank Budovitch, a senior congregation member and former synagogue president, said "if we had to get a rabbi tomorrow, we would probably get a man who would give only 50 per cent of what Rabbi Spiro has given."

Budovitch said Rabbi Spiro's giving likely includes areas "that I don't know about." Rabbi Spiro has served on the boards of the Victorian Order of Nurses and the Children's Aid Society, and as treasurer of Fredericton Hospital Pastoral Care Advisory Committee, comprised of 250 Fredericton-area clergy.

He also lectures on Judaism at the University of New Brunswick and St. Thomas University, and estimates he has led more than 15,000 people on tours of the synagogue.

Rabbi Spiro has never had a contract with the congregation. "I told the board in 1944, 'If I don't like you, I'll leave. If you don't want me, you can let me go.' I've never left so I guess we liked each other."

He and Edith, his wife of 49 years, raised two sons and a daughter, and have 17 grandchildren, all but three of whom attended the recent commemorative dinner; the remainder are studying in Israel. All family members are observant Orthodox Jews.

Rabbi Spiro said his 50-year commitment is "a record for Atlantic Canada, and perhaps for the entire country."

After looking after births, bar mitzvahs, marriages and deaths for 50 years, is he ready to retire?

"When I had my 40th anniversary, I said life begins at 40. When asked the question then, I said I will retire when G-d tells me to. I think I hear G-d whispering."

Jewish Agency evacuates Chechnya Jews

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Israel Line

MOSCOW — The Jewish Agency last week began evacuating Jewish families from the besieged Russian breakaway republic of Chechnya, the Israeli daily newspaper Yediot Aharonot reported.

Out of 80 Jews in the capital, Grozny, "some" have been moved "to a Russian city" outside Chechnya, while others were evacuated to Azerbaijan, reports say.

It is not known how the evacuation is proceeding or if any families were brought to Israel.

It is estimated that between 50 and 80 Jewish families live in Grozny, which came under Russian rocket and missile attack over the weekend, causing a huge outpouring of refugees and an unknown number of casualties.

Russian troops and tanks stormed the republic earlier this month, but stopped short of Grozny, until Sunday's pre-dawn attacks.

Jewish leaders here and abroad are worrying about how to protect and evacuate the few remaining Jews in the volatile region.

"All roads are blocked, but at the first opportunity they will leave. The conditions there are very, very bad," said Alla Levy, a deputy director at the Jewish Agency in Jerusalem.

"They didn't leave already because they had problems with their families or their property, and now they are very sorry about it," Levy said prior to reports that the agency had begun its evacuation.

Levy said a number of Jewish refugees have escaped to Nalchik, a city in a nearby republic.

"We are taking care of them and trying to take them to Israel," she said.

Located in the Caucasus Mountains in southern Russia, Chechnya is home to about 1.2 million people, mostly Muslims.

It has an old but small Jewish community, which, according to legend, dates back as early as the sixth century B.C.E.

In 1897, a census reported between 1,000 and 2,000 Jews in Grozny.

In the past few years, however, most of its members left for Israel or the United States.

Most of Chechnya's Jews were "Mountain Jews," the name given to Jews from the Caucasus who continued to follow their religious traditions even while adapting culturally to local life.

Michael Chlenov, who oversees the Vaad, the federation of Jewish institutions in Russia, recently visited Vladikavkaz, the capital of the neighboring republic of North Ossetia, where some Jews from Grozny have fled.

He said the Jewish refugees were reporting that Grozny had become overrun with crime and that they had fled the political instability.

According to Chlenov, Chechnya and other Muslim republics within Russia do not have a tradition of anti-Semitism.

However, Chechnya does have a strong independent streak, and anti-Russian feelings run deep.

The republic declared its independence from Moscow in 1991. The Russian leadership has since covertly backed the republic's political opposition as part of an attempt to topple the government of President Dzhokhar Dudayev.

Until now, however, the Russian government has avoided direct military involvement in Chechnya.

But earlier this month, 40,000 troops were sent in, the biggest Russian military action since the invasion of Afghanistan in 1979.

Numerous protests against the invasion took place in Moscow, as many expressed opposition to a renewed reliance on force by Russia.

"I think the situation is terrible for all the people in this country, Jews and Russians," said Alexander Lieberman, the director of the Moscow office of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews.

"If we have war, it could mean the end of democracy and free speech and the return to the time when we were a great empire, but a strong army with not enough food."

Taking a more cautious approach, Chlenov from the Vaad said, "The events in general are very important because they symbolize a change in the political situation in Russia." However, he said it is too early to analyze the implications of this change.

Chlenov noted that the Vaad signed a statement released by the recently formed Congress of National Minorities in Russia expressing disagreement with solving the problems in Chechnya through violence and bloodshed.

Instead, the congress suggested creating a new policy with input from representatives of the different peoples in the region.

Iraq's Jewish community declines as exodus continues

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Over the past three years, 80 Jews have left Iraq, while a similar number still reside in Baghdad and Basra, ex-Knesset member Mordechai Ben-Porat, revealed last Wednesday.

Acting Jewish Agency Chairman Yehiel Leket sharply criticized the release of news of the exodus, saying it was "insensitive and irresponsible," and could damage the Jewish community left behind.

The Jews who left were granted visas by the British and Dutch embassies, said the Iraq-born Ben-Porat, head of the Babylonian Heritage Centre.

The visas were issued before the Gulf War, but Iraqi authorities did not permit the Jews to leave until after the hostilities ended. In the past year, 10 Jews have left.

In 1948, Iraq was home to some 140,000 Jews.

Until now, there has been a news blackout on activities of the small community. Jewish Agency officials refused to comment on whether any of the Jews had come to Israel.

The Jewish community, consisting mainly of elderly people, is permitted freedom of worship. It does not have a rabbi, but there are a few cantors. Naji Elias, 70, whose relatives live in Holland, heads the community and meets two or three times a year with Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein, Ben-Porat said.

He said Baghdad was sending a signal to Israel and the West and that Jerusalem should regard Iraq as a bulwark against Iran, "our ultimate foe."

The heritage centre last week screened a one-minute clip from a recent video showing some 30 men and women praying at a Baghdad synagogue. Ben-Porat said there is also one class for the handful of Jewish children. They are permitted religious instruction and to pray in Hebrew, but no teaching of Hebrew is allowed.

Arms sales slammed

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SEOUL — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week accused North Korea of selling medium range missiles to Syria and Iran.

Rabin, who made the charge last Thursday while on a state visit to South Korea, also said North Korea was developing, with the financial backing of Iran, a long-range missile capable of hitting targets over 1,000 km away.

A missile with this range, Rabin pointed out, could be fired from Iran at Jerusalem.

Speaking at a joint news conference after holding talks with South Korean President Kim Young-sam, Rabin said North Korea is supplying Iran and Syria with technology that could be used to build missile launching systems.

Rabin said he urged South Korea and the United States to use their influence to stop North Korea from selling arms in the Middle East.

He added that he and the South Korean leader discussed areas of cooperation between the two countries, including economic issues and security.

"We focused on many issues on the civilian side, but we mentioned also the possibility of future cooperation in the defence area," he said.

During Rabin's stay in Seoul, Israel and South Korea signed agreements on establishing direct Tel Aviv-Seoul air links, cultural exchanges and cooperative ventures in agricultural technology.

Also last week, Rabin held talks in Tokyo with Japanese Foreign Minister Yohei Kono and Defence Agency chief Tokuichiro Tamazawa.

While in Japan, Rabin repeated the same charges about North Korean arms sales to Arab nations and the growing threat of Islamic fundamentalism.

The issues are sensitive for Tokyo, because there is concern in Israel that some Japanese aid to Tehran may have been diverted by Iran to help fundamentalists.

Rabin said an international effort was needed to end poverty in the Middle East because "terrorism" was bred by poverty.

The Japanese foreign minister offered Tokyo's help in repairing the Allenby Bridge to Jordan.

Rabin asked for Japan's assistance in building a dam on the Yarmuk River, in a meeting with Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama last Monday.

'King David' remark causes Knesset furor

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The governing coalition of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was bracing itself for — but expected to survive — a no-confidence motion this week in the wake of controversial remarks from Foreign Minister Shimon Peres regarding King David.

The motion, introduced by furious Orthodox Knesset members, threatened to be particularly awkward for the ruling Labor Party and its coalition ally, the secularist Meretz bloc.

The government has long been courting the Orthodox Shas Party in efforts to get it to rejoin the coalition. Shas's inclusion in the government would give the coalition an outright parliamentary majority as it continues with attempts to forge peace with the country's Arab neighbors.

But Shas, which has been fence-sitting for months, was under intense pressure to join with the other Orthodox parties in the no-confidence vote.

Labor and Meretz officials summoned home all their Knesset members from overseas trips. They also appealed to Arab Israeli members of the Knesset to vote against the no-confidence measure.

At the same time, the chairman of the governing coalition, Labor Knesset member Eli Dayan, himself Orthodox, was trying to persuade Orthodox Knesset members and their rabbinical mentors to simply accept a letter of apology from Peres.

Shimon Peres

The furor erupted Dec. 14, when Peres addressed the Knesset during a debate on the peace process.

Condemning Israeli occupation as contrary to the heritage of Judaism, the foreign minister was challenged by a rightist Knesset member, who cited the Bible as stating that King David conducted wars of occupation.

"Not everything that King David did on the ground or on the rooftops is Jewish in my eyes," Peres shot back.

His reference was to a passage in the book of Samuel, in which King David watched from a rooftop as Bathsheba was bathing. Smitten with her beauty, David sent her husband, Uriah, off to his death in battle and subsequently married her.

Peres' remark triggered loud and sustained protest from Orthodox members.

One parliamentarian, Avraham Verdiger of the United Torah Judaism bloc, became so overwrought, he passed out and required medical attention at the Knesset infirmary.

Orthodox Knesset members countered with Talmudic passages that put David's actions in a more positive light than the literal scriptural account would indicate.

They, along with incensed writers in the Orthodox press, accused Peres of gross disrespect for King David.

Peres sent a letter last Friday to Israel's chief rabbis and other religious leaders in which he disclaimed "any intention of insulting the 'Sweet Psalmist of Israel' " — the traditional title of King David.

But in a declaration published Sunday, the Rebbe of Gur, Rabbi Pinchas Menachem Alter, rejected Peres' letter as falling far short of a genuine apology.

While the government was expected to squeak past this latest test of its strength in the Knesset, the episode was widely seen as dooming any hopes that Labor would be able to woo Shas back into the coalition.

Knesset, Supreme Court clash at conference

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — A Canada-Israel legal conference on judicial review became embroiled in a heated debate between Israel's Knesset and its Supreme Court last week.

As justices and legal experts from Canada and Israel gathered in Jerusalem to discuss the nature and legitimacy of judicial review, the academic subject quickly became a hot political one.

The controversy began last week when several Members of Knesset demanded that the Supreme Court's authority be curbed, in the wake of a recent decision granting homosexual live-in companions the same company benefits as heterosexual ones. The ruling, which incensed the religious establishment, was the latest in a series of decisions that have prompted sharp criticism of the Supreme Court.

Much of the criticism has been directed at Justice Aharon Barak, who is slated to become the next president of the Supreme Court. Several politicians have accused Barak of allowing political considerations to determine his decisions and some are lobbying to prevent his appointment.

"I am a judge, not a politician, and I do not have a political agenda," said Barak at the Hebrew University conference, held under the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Program. "I have no interest in imposing my subjective views on the political establishment."

For many of the Canadian judges, the Israeli debate had a familiar ring to it. "As soon as a country adopts a bill of rights, the judiciary is accused of politicization," said Ontario Court of Appeal Justice Rosalie Abella. "If people don't like the judge's decision they say the judge is being political."

As Barak defended himself, the Knesset's law committee met to discuss whether the court's authority should be limited, whether judges should be selected on the basis of their ideological views, and whether such measures would compromise the independence of the judiciary.

The same issues were addressed at the conference by key players in the controversy, including Israeli Supreme Court justices Barak and Yitzhak Zamir, Justice Minister David Libai, Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet and Likud MK Dan Meridor. Foreign participants included Canadian Supreme Court justices Peter Cory, Frank Iacobucci and Gerald La Forest, and U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Ginsberg.

Hebrew University Law professor Mordechai Kremnitzer warned that the American system of choosing judges according to ideological considerations would not work in Israel.

"There are simply not enough excellent people to allow us to strive for political pluralism in the courts," said Kremnitzer. "If you take into account political views, you will compromise on standards of excellence. The judiciary will lose prestige and public confidence."

But Shetreet countered that "the Supreme Court will not enjoy the confidence of the public if its composition doesn't reflect that public."

Shetreet also argued that the court must justify any ruling that interferes with government decisions. Israel's Supreme Court has been criticized for taking an overly interventionist approach.

However Zamir defended the Court's approach, arguing that Israeli political culture makes this necessary. In other Western countries, ministers charged with serious offences would automatically resign. However, in Israel, this is not the case. If the Supreme Court had not recommended that Shas MK Aryeh Deri step down, the former minister of religious affairs — who is charged with numerous counts of corruption — would have continued to serve, thereby eroding public confidence in the Knesset, Zamir said.

Abella maintained that if a judiciary is doing its job properly, it will inevitably provoke controversy and criticism. "The judiciary is either taking stands which the legislature has refused to take for fear of electoral punishment, or restricting stands that the legislature has taken in order to get electoral approval. In 100 per cent of the cases, 50 per cent of the people are unhappy with the results," she said.

In his closing speech, Barak argued that most cases involving conflicting values must be decided by the court, and not the government. "To remove such cases from the court is to destroy the constitution of the state, and to deprive human rights of any constitutional protection," he said.

In resolving cases of conflicting values, a judge does not have absolute discretion, he said. But Barak added that in exceptional cases a judge has no choice but to resort to his subjective beliefs. .

Other conference participants were Chief Justice Catherine Fraser of the Alberta Court of Appeal, Canadian law professors Lorraine Weinrib (U of Toronto), Stephen Toope (McGill) and Irwin Cotler (McGill), one of the organizers. Legal experts from the United States, Europe and Israel also attended the meeting, which marked the second international conference of the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Program (CILCP).

The last conference in December 1992 was also held in the eye of a major political storm. While Israeli and Canadian judges discussed human rights, some of the Israeli participants — including Barak — had to decide whether to allow the deportation of some 400 Hamas activists to Lebanon.

The CILCP was founded in 1992 as a joint venture in human rights and law reform between Canada and Israel. It is co-chaired by Barak and Cotler.

Prosperous seasonal sales are predicted

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Retailers are in a festive mood this holiday season. Consumer spending is up.

"There's much more cash around" said Saul Korman, owner of Korry's Clothiers for Gentlemen on Danforth Avenue. "We're gearing up for the best season ever."

"People are out there shopping," said Mel Fruitman, executive vice-president of the Retail Council of Canada. "We should wind up the season showing a six per cent increase over last year."

Chris Kubas, a retail consultant, expects a prosperous season for retailers, especially for stores selling sporting goods and sportswear, computers and electronics, and ancillary items like CDs and computer games.

However, "clothing is not as strong as we like to see it," Fruitman said, adding lowered sales reflect changing customer needs. People dress more casually so they're buying less clothing. Women are looking for more durable styles with the result being less wardrobe turnover from year to year, he said.

Fruitman foresees only modest gains for this industry. "There are signs of growth, but we won't see the same kind of money as the '80s."

Fruitman said he expects high consumer spending on toys and jewelry because they are traditional items for the season. The holiday season is also the busiest time for the Children's Book Store, said owner Judy Sarick. "We start increasing our inventory all through November and December. You never know what's going to sell."

While sales have improved recently, consumers are still cost-conscious, Sarick said. "People are watching what they spend. One of the reasons they buy books is because they can get nice things for under $10."

The weather also can impact holiday sales. Sarick reported that warmer weather in November slowed sales, and Kubas said the recent cold snap has helped many retailers. "Psychologically shoppers need that snow on the ground to put them in the frame of mind [for holiday shopping]."

The holiday shopping season traditionally winds up with the Boxing Day Sale, which is already underway at Korry's because owner Korman says "it's wiser to get a little more margin in December than in January."

Sarick is also planning another Boxing Day sale, with 20 per cent off on everything in the store.'

Stores aren't legally allowed to open on Dec. 26 so shoppers will have to wait until Dec. 27 to get into the fray of hunting. Those chomping at the bit can always shop till they drop south of the border, where the stores are open on Boxing Day.

Fruitman doesn't believe cross boarder shopping poses a serious problem for Canadian retailers. "The cachet of cross border shopping has faded substantially," he said. "Prices in Canada are more competitive and with the decline of the Canadian dollar there are not so many bargains."

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, accompanied by a bodyguard, checks in for a meal at the Yehuda Avazi restaurant.

Mouthwatering kosher dishes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV —Israel's creme de la creme know where to dine when they're in this bustling, fun-loving city.

If they've got a hankering for classic Middle Eastern cuisine, they head for the Yehuda Avazi restaurant at 54 Etzel St. in southern Tel Aviv.

There they can partake of appetizers like hummus, main courses like shish kebab and desserts like creme Bavaria.

With its white stucco ceiling, dark brown tables and bright neon lights, the Yehuda Avazi is anything but understated.

But it's not the decor which attracts the likes of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, IDF Chief of Staff Ehud Barak and Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo to its precincts.

In a word, it's the food, the great, mouth-watering kosher dishes which are cooked, grilled, barbecued and baked to perfection.

Invariably crowded, particularly at night, the Yehuda Avazi is virtually unknown to foreign tourists. It's in a rather delapidated part of town, Hatikva, far from the glitter of Dizengoff's cafes and the Hayarkon Street hotel row.

Although I'm an old Israeli hand, I'd never heard if it either. I owe my introduction to the Yehuda Avazi to Ezra Zur, a Tel Hashomer advertising executive who prides himself on his palate.

Prominent Israelis

Ezra and his elegant wife, Yael, invited my wife and myself and our mutual friends, Ida and Aryeh Heilweil, to the restaurant.

The walls are a testament to its drawing power. They are covered with photographs of prominent Israelis who've supped there — top-ranking politicians (such as David Levy, the former deputy premier and foreign minister), ex-Israeli presidents and local sports and entertainment figures.

Almost immediately after being seated by Shimshon Amrani, one of the proprietors, we were served an array of starters on small platters.

The appetizers were dazzling — a variety of eggplant salads, tehina, green salad, mixed pickles, peppers, olives and hot mushrooms.

They went exceedingly well with the delicious, chewy, steaming hot Iraqi-style pita bread, baked next door by an Israeli Arab who learned the art of pita making from his grandfather.

Now it was time for the main course. I ordered lamb shashlik, garnished with crisp french fries. The meat was tender and juicy. I washed it down with a non-alcoholic black beer known in Hebrew as nesher shachor. Etti, my wife, had beef shashlik. She, too, was impressed by the quality of the meal.

Ezra and Yael had lamb ribs, while Ida and Aryeh feasted on roast chicken.

The English menu also features such exotica as "beff tonsil's," turkey and veal testicles and "skred of fish."

For dessert, we shared cream caramel, malaby (a Turkish delight), jello, Oriental pastries and coffee.

We left perfectly sated, secure in the knowledge that we had eaten well. In fact, looking back, it was the single best meal I had in Israel.

Yiddish theatre in Warsaw

By GIDEON KEREN
Special to The CJN

One of the more surprising discoveries to be made in Poland is that of the active professional Yiddish theatre company working in the centre of Warsaw.

Maybe it shouldn't be all that surprising since before World War II, there were 3.5 million Jews living in Poland. But now, with 10,000 Jews living in the country, it is curious that the Warsaw theatre is virtually the only Yiddish theatre in the world to be funded by the state.

The Jewish theatre's beginnings in post-war Poland were very modest. A Yiddish concert was given in Lublin in 1945 by the Jewish actress Diana Blumenfeld for a small group of Jewish survivors from the Treblinka concentration camp. There were still some 250,000 Jews living in Poland then, many in Lower Silesia, where Soviet Jews had settled.

In 1946 the 23rd Congress of the Union of Jewish Actors merged the various Jewish theatre groups into two permanent theatres in Lodz and Wroclaw, and in 1950 the Polish Government agreed to form the Ester Rachel Kaminska State Jewish Theatre, managed by her daughter, Ida Kaminska. The two theatres in Lodz and Wroclaw continued to function until 1955, when they were replaced by one theatre in Warsaw.

The repertoire consisted of established classics such as Sholem Aleichem's Tevye the Milkman (which in turn inspired the American musical Fiddler on the Roof), I. L. Peretz's A Night at the Old Market Place, Anski's Dybbuk, Goldfaden's Two Kuni-Lemels, Gordin's God, Man and the Devil and Stars on the Roof, about vanished shtetl life.

There were also contemporary pieces which followed, or more to the point, had to follow a certain ideological line.

Polish authorities wanted the Jewish theatre to focus on issues affecting Jews and Poles in modern Polish society. These would include Yiddish adaptations of Polish plays with a Jewish theme, such as Korczak and his Children, about the Jewish doctor who chose to die with his charges in the Warsaw ghetto, and the historical The Song of My Nation which, according to the original program, "reveals the traditions of cooperation of the Jewish and Polish people in defence of their mutual country, the period when they have met in the ranks of the revolutionary movement, then the tragic years of World War II and their joint struggle against the Nazi invader, and finally the period of People's Poland, the socialist country of all working people, irrespective of their origin and nationality, of which Polish and Jewish revolutionaries have been dreaming."

Szymon Szurmiej

In 1970 the company moved into its current home on Grzybowski Square. Faced with audiences who did not understand Yiddish and suffering the loss of a large number of experienced Jewish actors who left the country following the anti-Semitic upheavals of 1968 and 1969, director Szymon Szurmiej knew there had to be changes.

An agile and prepossessing man who is fluent in four languages, Szurmiej looks younger than his 72 years.

Born in Volhynia in Eastern Poland, he grew up in a Yiddish-speaking household. When the Germans invaded Poland in 1939 he escaped to the Soviet Union, was promptly arrested and sent to a camp in Siberia. From there he was sent to Kazakhstan and managed to enrol in acting school in Alma Ata. He went on to become art director of the Opole theatre and director of the Powszechny and Wspolczesny Theatres in Worclaw. In 1968 he was dismissed from his post and began working with the State Jewish Theatre.

Szurmiej is adamant that Yiddish theatre was his first love and he never deserted it. "I have always been proud to be a Jew and a Yiddishist. I never changed my name or pretended to be a Pole. I was born with this language and ... since childhood I have fought for Yiddish culture."

That fight includes establishing an actors' studio and a mime school for young drama students of all religions.

Szurmiej becomes defensive when asked how many of the theatre's members are actually Jews. "To me, this question smacks of nationalism. One should not ask how many Jews there are, but how many actors."

There are 33: 21 in the studio and 12 in the mime school. All but four are non-Jewish. "After all, they have the Polish theatre school," Szurmiej says. "They don't have to come here. But they do so because they are fascinated with Jewish culture."

The truth may be a little less idealistic. Many of the actors are there because they failed to get into Polish drama school. One company actor said, "If they could get into a Polish drama school now, they'd all jump at the chance."

So enthusiastic is Szurmiej about Yiddish culture, he has tried to start Yiddish theatre groups in Moscow, Kiev and Vilnius.

EILAT — Thanks to Israel's peace treaty with Jordan, this desert resort town has entered "a new era," claims its mayor, Gabi Kadosh.

Eilat, he believes, is poised to become the hub of a Red Sea Riviera running from Petra in Jordan to Sharm al-Sheikh in Egypt.

Kadosh, Eilat's first Likud mayor, says he devised the Red Sea Riviera concept during last year's municipal election campaign.

And he is positive it is achievable. "It is not just a dream. It is a campaign promise I intend to fulfil."

Kadosh's proposal has the support of Israel, Jordan and Egypt. The question is when, not if, it can be put into effect, according to analysts.

In the meantime, Kadosh hopes that Arab tourists in Jordan will be tempted to visit Eilat, a free trade zone with a population of 30,000.

Education programs

"If we market ourselves correctly," he observed, "10 per cent to 20 per cent of our tourists in the future will be Arabs."

Although Kadosh has yet to visit Aqaba, the neighboring Jordanian port across the Gulf of Aqaba, he envisions cooperation in such fields as tourist promotion, aviation and water desalination.

Eilat, he added, continues to promote itself as a prime tourist destination. It boasts 6,000 rooms in 32 hotels. An additional 6,000 rooms in 14 new hotels, are scheduled to be completed soon.

A casino managed by the municipality is a project he champions. However, Kadosh is not in any hurry to build one. "We're studying the idea and its implications."

Nevertheless, Kadosh feels that one-fifth of the profits generated by a casino should be ploughed into social welfare and education programs.

Looking still further ahead, Kadosh hopes to widen Eilat's economic base by transforming it into an international financial centre. "The Ministry of Finance is working on it," he said.

And he wants to attract hi-tech industry to Eilat so that it can become Israel's Silicon Valley. "I'm optimistic that this can happen," he declared.

Finally, Kadosh wants to build a full-fledged university which will attract Jewish and Arab students.

Judy Ostfeld, the mayor's assistant, said that Eilat has received millions of dollars worth of free publicity since the signing of the Israel-Jordan peace treaty near Eilat in October.

Travel Talk

By Bill Gladstone

In 1992, Spain celebrated the 500th anniversary of the first New World voyage by the Italian-born navigator Christopher Columbus, who sailed in the service of Spain and is commonly and erroneously described as the discoverer of America. It is a lamentable fact of Jewish history that the very same Queen Isabella, who hocked her jewellery to fund the voyage, signed the expulsion order against the Jews only two weeks before the explorer's departure.

Sepharad '92, which focused the eyes of the world on Spain in 1992, was a country-wide celebration during which a World Expo unfolded in Seville, the Olympics were run in Barcelona, and Madrid was deemed the cultural capital of Europe. It was also a time of official acknowledgement of past sins. On March 31, 1992, in a public ceremony in Toledo, the King and Queen of Spain formally cancelled the law that required the expulsion of the Jews, an edict that initiated one of the darkest episodes of Jewish history.

The Jews had enjoyed a Golden Age in Spain, and remains of their civilization, even after half a millenium, are still being uncovered. "They recently discovered a synagogue beneath an old building in Zaragoza, and they immediately declared it a national monument," reports Margarita Ramon, public relations director for the Tourist Office of Spain in Toronto. "This is happening continuously. We are excavating and finding more and more all the time."

This synagogue is an example of Jewish architecture that can be found in Spain.

The Spanish Tourist Office and Petach Tikvah Synagogue on Danby Road in North York recently concluded a week-long joint promotion of Jewish Spain as a tourist destination. Within Spain, academic and popular interest in the country's Jewish past is very strong, Ramon reports, and there are numerous related exhibits and events occurring continuously.

Several town councils within Spain are working to establish a Jewish Communities Route, says Ramon. The goal is to design an itinerary and print a brochure detailing hotels, synagogues, the availability of kosher foods, and other services. "It will be filled with specific information for the Jewish traveller. There may even be a kiosk along the route where travellers can get more information."

Eli Abitbol, president of the travel company Gateways International, says he is astonished by the occasional emergence of new Jewish sites in Spain. "It's a miracle that we can find anything after 500 years," he says. "Look at Poland or Germany, where we can hardly find anything after 50 years. To find synagogues and streets with Jewish names in Spain, that's a definite miracle."

Gateways (905-475-5758 or 800-268-0900) is one of several Canadian companies which have organized group tours of Sephardi Spain. Another is New Wave Travel (416-928-3000), which is offering a Jewish heritage tour of Spain, set to depart July 2, 1995. The itinerary includes Cordoba, Barcelona, Gerona and other cities.

(Also of interest to Sephardi travellers is Gateway's upcoming tour of Morocco, set to depart May 16. "After Lag B'Omer, Sephardi Jews traditionally visit the tombs of famous rabbis and holy men," Abitbol explains.)

The Tourist Office of Spain offers many worthwhile brochures about Jewish Spain, all at no charge. They include the wonderful, fully illustrated, 64-page booklet A Trip Through Jewish Spain, as well as the smaller Exploring the Jewish Heritage in Spain. Brochures on individual cities are also available. Write or telephone the Tourist Office of Spain, 802 Bloor St. W., Suite 1400, Toronto, Ont. M5S 1M8. Phone (416) 961-3131; fax (416) 961-1992.

Lufthansa flights are testing wines from the Golan Heights

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV — Lufthansa German Airlines has added yet another feather to its cap.

Last year, when the Frankfurt-based carrier marked its 25th year of operations in Israel, it had the distinction of becoming the first foreign airline to dispense Israeli wines aboard its flights.

Since then, passengers flying to and from Israel have enjoyed Carmel Mizrachi wines as part of Lufthansa's service.

Now Lufthansa has expanded its Israeli wine list by introducing a selection from the Golan Heights Winery on its first-class flights to and from Ben-Gurion Airport.

Lufthansa, which offers regularly-scheduled flights to Germany from Canada, bought about $90,000 worth of Golan's Cabernet Sauvignon for a four-month trial period.

"Let's hope it will be successful," said Izhak Zaroni, Lufthansa's public relations manager in Israel.

"It's a tremendous honor for us," added Adam Montefiore, Golan Heights Winery overseas sales manager. "We're in a very competitive market."

Lufthansa, Zaroni explained, is known for being exceedingly discriminating when it comes to fine wine. As he put it, "We choose only high-quality wines."

Lufthansa and Golan Heights Winery, which has won numerous awards at international competitions, were matched up at a fair in Germany.

"Lufthansa experts tasted their wine and they liked it," Zaroni said.

Lufthansa, which serves fresh kosher meals upon request, was pleased to offer its passengers a greater variety of Israeli wine because it is good for business.

Thanks to its marketing strategy, Lufthansa has made some inroads into the Jewish religious market in Israel.

Golan Heights Winery, whose wines are kosher, produces three basic brands — Yarden, Gamla and Golan. They run the gamut from dry reds to semi-dry whites.

Interestingly enough, its wines were used at the recent Nobel Peace Prize ceremony in Oslo, Norway, which honored Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat.

And recently, Hollywood filmmaker Steven Spielberg bought seven cases.

Golan Heights Winery vineyards are situated at an altitude of between 400 and 1,200 metres. The climate — cold in winter and dry in summer — and the soil — volcanic basalt — are ideal for the production of top-quality grapes.

Established in 1983, the winery is owned by eight settlements — seven on the Golan and one in the Galilee.

In an interview, Montefiore said that it combines state-of-the-art technology with traditional vinification techniques.

Like the winery, Lufthansa is on the cutting edge of technology.

With 14 weekly flights to Israel from Frankfurt and Munich, Lufthansa uses the most modern aircraft in its fleet for its Israeli service — the jumbo Boeing 747, the Airbus A-320 and the newest addition, the Airbus-340.

In the first nine months of 1994, Lufthansa carried 156,432 passengers to and from Israel, making it the largest foreign carrier flying the route.

In a quarter of a century, Lufthansa has carried more than two million passengers on the Israeli route.

Lufthansa, whose security measures are extremely strict, was the first foreign airline to resume flights to Israel after the 1991 Gulf War. It was also the last foreign airline to suspend flights before that war.

Lufthansa plays an integral role in the flow of German tourist traffic to Israel. During the first nine months of this year, 141,883 Germans went to Israel, an 11 per cent increase over 1993.

Now that Israel and Jordan have signed a peace treaty, Zaroni expects Lufthansa to increase its service to the Jewish state. Details have yet to be worked out.

Rumors quashed over capital gains

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Finance Minister Avraham Shohat has quashed speculation that the Israeli government might back away from implementing the recently enacted capital gains tax.

The Tel Aviv stock market has fluctuated in response to rumors that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin would shelve the controversial 10 per cent tax on Israeli investors that was enacted in November.

At a stormy Labor Party caucus meeting, Shohat lashed out at party members opposed to the tax. He dismissed the rumors that Rabin was considering abolishing or delaying the tax and said it would take effect as planned.

Detrimental effect on stock market

One of the critics of the tax, Economics Minister Shimon Shetreet said it would have a detrimental effect on the stock market and would erode public confidence in the economy.

"The drifting of the tax has caused some confusion and loss of confidence in the economy and capital markets."

Also, because Israel has not resolved the issue of taxing foreign investors, they are showing great hesitation in going into our market, Shetreet told Israel Radio.

Aharon Fogel, director-general of the Finance Ministry disagreed saying there was no connection between the tax and the recent market fluctuations.

TORONTO — Good service, great prices and a sensitivity to client needs are some of the reasons behind the success of Payless Travel.

"When people deal with us, they know they are getting the best price, so there does not have to be any bargaining or shopping around," said president and founder Ehud Telem. "We will not be undersold."

Travellers often pay top price, but Telem says his staff saves money by looking at "all possible [travel] options."

Telem, who has been in the travel business for over 25 years, says most of his staff have at least 10 years experience in the business. "There are at least one or two specialists for every destination."

Maria Portwood specializes in Hawaii and France and recommends Hawaii as an all-year destination. "Many people don't realize that Hawaii is at its most gorgeous from May to December."

Portwood has arranged biking tours and tours for other interests. "I've even arranged a wedding in Hawaii. If its there, I'll arrange it," she says.

Telem is especially proud of his agency's bar/bat mitzvah family tour. "Our philosophy is to incorporate a lot of family activities into the tour without taking away from the cultural value. It is also almost all-inclusive so people know what they are getting before they leave home."

Well-organized

Among the tour's highlights are an archaeological dig, a camel tour in the Negev, sunrise at Massada, boat ride on the Sea of Galilee, a visit to an army base and Canadian United Nations post, two traditional Shabbat dinners, and kayaking at the Banias.

"It is a well-balanced tour that has become a proven success for kids and parents. It meets the needs of the whole family. Our aim is to give people as much as they can get for their money and to see them happy."

Letters from Payless clients attest to the success of the bar/bat mitzvah tour. "The entire program was well-organized and especially enjoyed by the children . . . the hit of the trip was the Bedouin night. I still find it amazing that they had flush toilets and marble showers in the middle of the Judean desert," wrote one client.

Inventors pitch ideas to hi-tech Israeli firms

JEWISH BULLETIN OF NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

PALO ALTO, Calif. — It's a warm afternoon at the Albert L. Schultz Jewish Community Centre, and scientist Sheldon L. Matlow is explaining his scientific discovery to a reporter as though he were selling a spot remover with a money-back guarantee.

"Our chemistry is so fast," says the CEO of Nace Technology in San Jose, that at the end of a chemical manufacturing process "there is no material left for [harmful] side reactions."

So fast, he says, that it can create purer and safer chemical compounds for products like pharmaceuticals or protective coatings for paintings.

Matlow was one of 15 inventors, creators and scientists who brought their ideas to the JCC hoping to become part of the hottest Israeli hi-tech and business trend: the incubator.

An incubator is a privately owned, not-for-profit Israeli laboratory and testing ground.

Chosen scientists bring their innovative ideas there and work for two years on the government payroll. The object is to develop these ideas into marketable products.

The government spends up to $300,000 on each project, including the cost of developing the product and paying the salaries of the inventor and four full-time scientists.

Incubators, the brainchild of Israeli chief scientist Shuki Gleitman, were introduced four years ago by the Israeli government to provide new emigre scientists with jobs, as well as opportunities to develop ideas they were working on in the former Soviet Union but did not have the resources to complete.

A total of 280 products are currently being developed in 28 incubators throughout Israel, according to the Santa Clara office of the Government of Israel Economic Mission.

In an effort to drum up more hi-tech projects, one of the incubators, Ofakim Innovative Technologies, sent managing director David Dolev-Lipitz and board member Yaacov Sella — a former Israeli consul general in San Francisco — to the Silicon Valley in June.

At the incubator in the small town of Ofakim west of Beersheva in the Negev, scientists are working on 11 projects.

Among them are a new kind of foam to combat oil spills, a computerized heart and lung monitor, skin grafting equipment and a way to freeze hemorrhoids.

The June session, co-sponsored by Ofakim Technologies and the Government of Israel Economic Mission, was attended by about 30 people, half of them inventors.

Dolev-Lipitz and Sella explained how Ofakim works and what it would mean if the inventors got their projects accepted into the incubator program.

"We are here to attract projects to the incubator that are more market-driven," Sella said after his presentation was over.

Across the room one inventor was opening a large, three-ring binder to show Dolev-Lipitz his hi-tech water compressor.

In Silicon Valley, Dolev-Lipitz believes, people understand and work with market-driven concepts better than people who have just come to Israel from a small town in the Ukraine, for instance.

That hunch was correct. Two days after the conference, Dolev-Lipitz predicted that five of the 15 hi-tech projects that he looked at will probably make it all the way to Ofakim, although he would not say which projects.

"The results surpassed all our expectations," said Dolev-Lipitz, who explained that typically, 90 to 95 per cent of proposed projects are not accepted.

He also was proud of the fact that those whose projects look good will consider making aliyah.

"For us, it was a very useful conference," he said. "It will take us five or six months just to digest the success we had here."

First round of talks targeting free trade

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Canada and Israel have agreed on the main principles of a free trade agreement following the first round of talks held in Israel last week.

Zohar Peri, the chief Israeli negotiator, said the two sides are not far apart. He expects an agreement to be signed by next year.

"The leaders of both countries have decided to give top priority to reaching a free trade agreement," announced the Israeli ministry of industry and trade.

During the two days of talks, Israel said it would exempt all Canadian industrial exports from customs in return for the same.

The main stumbling block in the talks is the level of protection to be granted to various agricultural products. Canada expressed willingness to allow duty-free agricultural imports if Israel would do the same. However each side has a list of exceptions requiring special treatment in agriculture.

Israel is anxious to sign a free trade agreement with Canada because of the adverse effect the North American Free Trade Agreement is expected to have on Israeli exports to Canada. By allowing U.S. companies to export duty-free goods to Canada, NAFTA makes it more difficult for Israeli firms to compete with American ones. Israel is also interested in signing a free trade agreement with Mexico for the same reason.

Israel's own free trade agreements — with the United States and Europe — put Canada at a trading disadvantage. Because of high tariffs, Canadian companies, particularly in the potentially lucrative construction industry, cannot compete with American firms exporting to Israel. This has prompted Canada to change its longstanding opposition to a free trade agreement with Israel.

In 1993, trade between the two countries was $310 million. In the first half of 1994, Israeli exports to Canada fell five per cent, and consisted of precious stones and metals (27 per cent of the total), machinery and equipment (15 per cent), and agricultural and food products (12 per cent).

By contrast, Canadian exports to Israel jumped 33 per cent. The main products were machinery and equipment (26 per cent), metals (16 per cent), and paper and cardboard (nine per cent).

Jr. Judaica books bridge age gap

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Encyclopedias for the younger set often suffer from an excess of cuteness, pretention or superficiality that render them of little use to the serious youngster.

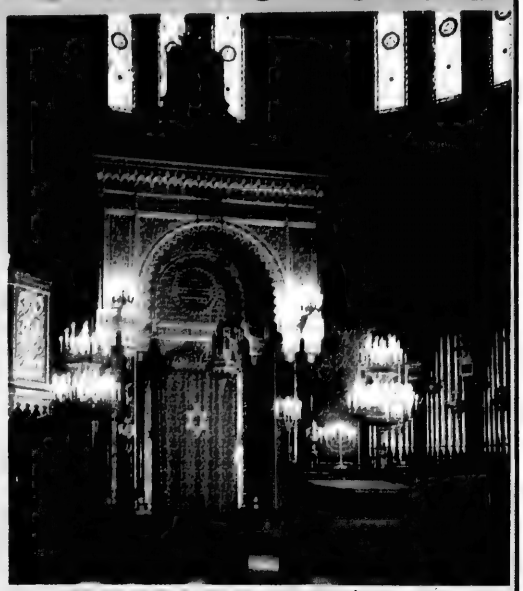
Junior Judaica: Encyclopedia Judaica for Youth (Keter Publishing House, 1994 revised editon) manages to avoid these pitfalls. The six volumes are packed with interesting articles, effective pictures (many in color), and a wide enough range of material to bridge the gap until the user is old enough to turn to the regular Encyclopedia Judaica.

Like its adult counterpart, Junior Judaica deals with history, religion, geography, art, biographies and issues of concern to Jews, such as anti-Semitism, biblical archeology and music.

The sections on Israel are particularly good, replete with fascinating photographs, stamps and color reproductions.

Canada is not extensively covered (if one takes it seriously, Judaism only exists in Toronto and Montreal), but what is covered is reasonably accurate and interesting. Even if one is left to ponder where a pictured synagogue in Don Mills called Beth El actually is.

Like regular Judaica, the index is excellent, an essential aid to the effective use of the encyclopedia. In the index volume one also finds the very useful 100-year calendar, covering the years from 1920 to 2020.



The eastern wall of the Great Synagogue in Florence, Italy, completed in 1882. [Junior Judaica]

While the language is somewhat simplified, it is by no means elementary. The younger child may well need a dictionary for certain parts, but on the whole, those able to use it should not find it a problem.

Editor-in-chief Raphael Posner notes in his introduction that Junior Judaica is "for continuous reading as much as it is a reference book," and there is no doubt this is so.

Youngsters will find it not just invaluable as a reference source, but will enjoy just browsing through it. Where else can you find out the Jewish view of angels, vegetarianism and mathematics all in the same set of books?

Junior Judaica is distributed in Canada by Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave. W., Toronto M6C 2C1, or telephone (416) 256-1010.

The Bell Curve: Intelligence & Class Structure in American Life, by Richard J. Herrnstein & Charles Murray (Distican, $40).

This book, co-authored by a recently deceased Harvard psychologist (Herrnstein) and a well-known political scientist (Murray), has caused a fire storm of debate and acrimony.

It is doubtful, however, that many who decry or praise its findings have read it. It is a pedantic study of almost 850 pages filled with statistics, charts, tables, graphs and technical verbiage.

What has caused the brouhaha?

The authors maintain that IQ (intelligence quotient) as measured on standardized tests is a determining factor in success or failure in life. The North American economy is demanding high intelligence to perform complicated and involved work. As a result, smart people are winning a larger share of the important jobs as well as wealth and power.

"It is likely that 70 to 80 per cent of persons in the top decile of intelligence have been channeled into this narrow world."

To the contrary, people of low intelligence are being left behind and account for a disproportionate number of social ills: unemployment, poverty, illegitimacy, welfare dependency and crime.

The most incendiary of the book's conclusions is that blacks on average are less intelligent than whites, scoring about 15 points lower on intelligence tests, and that East Asians are brighter than whites, scoring about three points higher.

Moreover, contend the authors, success or failure is a result of inherited genes: as much as 40 to 80 per cent of cocognitive ability is genetic. Thus, the slow witted are doomed to a lower economic and social position. "The problems associated with low cognitive functioning cannot be solved through intervention outside the home."

From their findings, it would be reasonable to reassess or abolish projects such as affirmative action, Head Start projects for disadvantaged pre-school aged children and widespread welfare subsidies.

Aware their conclusions will strike many as elitist and racist, the authors stress the true challenge for society is to achieve a social framework within which everyone is able to find a valued place that provides lasting satisfactions.

Cultural factors

Those who denounce and oppose all of this argue that intelligence comes in many forms and is not easily measured. Our complicated gender inheritance involves as many as 10,000 genes and we are only beginning to discover how complicated it is. In addition, many of the IQ tests simply reflect existing socio-economic inequalities and do not take into account a host of cultural factors.

It is ironic that in the early years of the 20th century Eastern European immigrants — largely Jewish — were considered undesirable because of their low intelligence. Today their descendants score among the highest on the IQ tests.

Finally, the critics are outraged because the book's questionable conclusions give comfort to the most bigoted and mean spirited elements in North American society and confirm unproved stereotypes. They also provide a political agenda for reactionaries who want to transform the nature of modern society.

Undoubtedly, The Bell Curve is the latest broadside in a protracted battle about race and class in our society, with additional salvos from both sides to be anticipated.

Cantorfest boasts 11 tenors and pack a full house

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Los Angeles may have recently featured three tenors in recital, but Toronto can now boast of a concert featuring 11.

Cantorfest was held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue by the Toronto Council of Hazzanim to celebrate Chanukah and raise money for various Jewish charities.

Not only did the event attract a packed house, but gave audience members an in-depth look into the art of chazzanut.

Participating cantors came in all shapes, sizes, ages and vocal ranges. Not all were in perfect voice, an occupational hazard given the cold and flu season, but that did not stop them from expressing their joy of music from the heart.

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda's cantor Louis Danto sang first. The dean of Toronto chazzanut, Danto still delights with the sweetness and expressiveness of his operatic delivery. Danto was later paired with one of the new kids on the block, Beth Tikvah's Efraim Sapir, in the lyrical duet Areshet S'gateinu, which brought two generations of cantors delightfully together.

Sapir and Beth Radom's Hesh Meyersdorf impressed the crowd with their energetic singing, but the biggest applause of the evening went to Holy Blossom's Benjamin Maissner for his comical rendition of the Yiddish folk song The Chazzan and the Gabbai.

Different cantors brought different strengths to the evening. Har Zion's Martin Steinhouse and Beth Jacob's Moishe Ginz are blessed with wonderful lower registers which add weight to their voices, and Ginz in particular is very expressive of face and voice. Temple Sinai's Thomas Schwartz is another weighty singer who is also a good interpreter.

Probably the most flexible vocal instrument belongs to Beth David's Yehuda Rottner, while Beth Tzedec's cantor Paul Kowarsky possesses a strong voice and ringing tones. Shaarei Tefillah's Chaim Weiner and Adath Israel's A. Eliezer Kirshblum asppeared under the weather but still negotiated complex chazzanut with panache.

Traditional Hebrew and Yiddish songs were scattered throughout the formal chazzanut arias, making for a fast-paced and interesting evening. Choirs from Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda and Adath Israel contributed back up in two numbers, and musical accompaniment for the evening was ably provided by pianists Brahm Goldhamer and Nathan Rosen along with The Ted Labow Instrumental Ensemble.

Charles Heller, the music director of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, arranged six of the selections, and Kowarsky composed Al Hanissim, the spirited song that closed the concert. A special kudo belongs to Doron Ophir and his Adath Israel Choir who displayed impressive harmonic and vocal tightness.

An evening of modern music, dance

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish themes intermingled with modern music and dance at the first of three musical evenings presented by Musica Beth Tikvah at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue in north Toronto.

In the first half of the evening, flautist Susan Hoeppner and pianist Lydia Wong played their lush interpretations of compositions by Ernest Bloch, Darius Milhaud, Paul Ben-Haim and the synagogue's programming director, Srul Irving Glick.

Filled with resonant folk images and hints of Oriental mystery, Bloch's Suite Modale for Flute and Piano was the perfect opener. Hoeppner and Wong were equally adept at presenting the wide range of colors to be found in the Sonatine by Milhaud, a French composer who preferred lighthearted, joyous music over the serious, heavy German music once in vogue.

Haunting and passionate, Ben-Haim's Sephardic Melody was a suitable warm-up piece for Glick's Sonata for Flute and Piano, which the composer introduced by saying that Hoeppner and Wong had already recorded "the ideal performance of this work." If so, their rendering of it for Musica Beth Tikvah must have been a close second.

The second part of the evening featured modern dance by members of the Me'Irim Dance Company, a Toronto-based group that explores Jewish history through music and dance. The works performed were Tehilot (excerpt), To the Four Corners of the Earth, Shabbatai Tzvi and Out of Eden. The audience, consisting of about 200 people, seemed highly appreciative.

"Me'Irim is the only dance group that is performing works of Jewish significance in the city," Musica Beth Tikvah publicist Marilyn Birenbaum told The CJN. "There is no other group that performs works that have to do with Jewish history and Jewish ideas. They're completely unique."

About 60 people turned up for an informative pre-concert discussion featuring Hoeppner, Glick and Me'Irim artistic director Shula Saltzman.

As part of the Musica Beth Tikvah series, the Toronto Children's Chorus performs on Feb. 4, and Chazzan Efraim Sapir sings with special guest artists Brahm Goldhammer, Yitchak Argaman and Kathryn Moses on April 2. For tickets, call (416) 221-3433.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

"Do We Not Bleed?": In October, the respected British journal The Spectator ran a three-page article by William Cash, a British writer based in Los Angeles, asserting that Hollywood is run by a Jewish cabal of studio kingpins whose ranks include David Geffen, Jeffrey Katzenberg, Mike Ovitz, Sidney Sheinberg, Steven Spielberg and Lew Wasserman.

These and other members of Hollywood's "New Establishment," Cash alleged, exclude non-Jews from the upper ranks of America's entertainment industry. He described the case of one professional, a gentile, who allegedly found it necessary to wear a gold Magen David around his neck to further his career. According to Cash, the media do not expose this Jewish conspiracy because they are part of it — the cabal's "official mouthpiece is the New York Times," he wrote.

The "inevitable shrieks of 'anti-Semitism' " that Cash predicted would come after his accusations were not long in arriving. Neville Nagler, chief executive of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, wrote a letter to The Spectator in which he noted the sneering tone of the article and called it "deeply unpleasant and distasteful ... filled with unjustified generalizations and unwarranted stereotypes." Board member Mike Whine said "the article purports not to be anti-Semitic while perpetrating the very myths that feed prejudice."

The controversy quickly reached across the Atlantic. "Cash rightfully accuses the likes of Lew Wasserman, Steven Spielberg and Michael Ovitz — who happen to be American Jews — of one sin, success," wrote Rabbis Marvin Hier and Abraham Cooper of the L.A.-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre in a letter to The Spectator.

"But by labelling these individuals ... as an insidious 'cabal,' Cash has actually plagiarized a page from the playbook of Julius Streicher and Joseph Goebbels. In the 1920s and '30s, those masters of racist stereotyping identified Jewish involvement in financial markets as a justification for, and a means to, fanning the flames of bigotry and genocide."

Hier and Cooper also noted that Cash neglected to mention the considerable influence of "the Oprahs, the Cosbys and some of the investors in Tokyo, who have a little bit to say about how their studios in Hollywood are run."

The Los Angeles Times and the New York Times both reported on the controversy, the latter in a front-page article headed, Stereotype of Jews is Revived. Last month, in a wordy analysis, Spectator editor Dominic Lawson (who is Jewish) acknowledged that Cash's use of the word 'cabal' was unfortunate, but argued that the widespread negative reaction was a form of political correctness that could threaten freedom of speech.

Responding to the deluge of complaints, Cash admitted "the glib tone of my piece ... badly ruffled sensitive egos," but complained his meaning had been misconstrued. "If I have injured any feelings, I apologize, but certainly no anti-Semitism was intended or felt." Several letter-writing apologists for Cash noted that he, being a British journalist, made a stock in trade of being scurrilous and offensive.

As The Spectator's Letters page indicates, the tempest shows no signs of abating. "Conspiracy theories, 'facts' with little or no basis in truth, code words like 'Jewish cabal', all the usual canards are rounded up in this 'investigation' into the supposed dominance by a new elite," remarked a recent letter.

"We have seen it all before, from the Inquisition in [15th-century] Spain to the Holocaust of 20th-century Germany. We have seen the results of hateful scapegoating, of ascribing group traits, of baseless charges of exclusionism. What we have not seen lately is this type of racist creed aired in distinguished journals such as The Spectator."

That particular letter was signed by a cabal of Hollywood heavies: Kevin Costner, Tom Cruise, Bob Daly, Kirk Douglas, Charlton Heston, Jim Hilvert, Frank Mancuso, Michael Ovitz, Sidney Poitier, Bruce M. Ramer, Sidney J. Sheinberg, Steven Spielberg, Barbra Streisand, Jack Valenti and Lew Wasserman.

275 PERSONAL COMPANIONS WANTED

This ad goes out to all honest, approachable, easy-going, balbatishe, haymishe, refined, sincere, sweet, big, heavy-set, rubinesque, stocky-built, tall, zuftig women 5'6" and over, 150lbs. and over, who are extremely excellent, powerful, strong endurance marathon swimmers, very agile in the swimming pool and into swiming all year round on a regular daily basis. Perhaps you are or were a lifeguard, swimming instructor or a member of a Masters Swimclub.
I am a Conservative Jewish male, 36 years of age, 6'0" tall with dark straight brown hair, brown eyes, clean-shaven and have never been engaged or married before. I am a non-smoker, non-drinker, non-gambler and a non-drug user, have no children and keep kosher both in and out of home. Some of my interests include swimming all year as I have a collection of Speedo swimsuits ranging from red for the Liberals, blue for the Conservatives and green for the Reform Party as I swim laps several times per week.
I also like to play basketball, go bowling, go to movies as well as attend Hebrew Israeli Chassidic Concerts and Synagogue services.
Interested, affectionate, compassionate, stable women who have never been engaged or married before, have no children and share my characteristcs, interests as well as my Jewish and general lifestyle are cordially invited to respond.
Honest, serious and sincere replies only please to Harvey at 638-8017.
Thank-you.
